TIRZAH ENCAMPMENT.

BIG CROWDS ATTENDED BOTH DAYS.

The Speakers And Portions of Their Speeches—Dr. Strait Charged With Talking Against Senators Tillman and McLaurin.

Those who went to Tirzah encampment to hear Mr. Sibley of Pennsylvania were disappointed. He did not attend. But the crowd had speaking all the same. The address of welcome was delivered by T. F. McDow Esq., formerly of Lancaster, now of Yorkville.

President Wilborne of the State Alliance and Dr. Strait made speeches, the following account of which we take from the News and Courier, and the Columbia Daily Record respectively:

The Hon. J. C. Wilborn, president of the State Alliance, was introduced next. He called on all to identify themselves with the Order. Those who would not do so were true niether to the State nor themselves, their wives, their blue-eyed boys, nor their bright-eyed girls. The Alliance was the greatest means of education ever given to the people of South Carolina. Many joined the Order. There was a rush to get in that they would find a sack of corn or some sugar to take home to "Betsey and the Baby." Disappointed in this they began to abuse the Order and left it. All these must come back. He illustrated the importance of the farmers by saying that the exported farm products of the United States amounted to more than six hundred million dollars, yet the farmers got no benefit from this inflow of gold. He insisted that the farmers should hang together.

A WEAK ATTACK.

Dr. T. J. Strait took the place of the expected orator of the day, and, without mentioning names, made a weak attack on Tillman and McLaurin in the interest of Irby, Evans & Co.

When Strait got through, Col. J. D. M. Shaw asked Commisioner Wilborn, "What did you think of that speech?"

"I did not hear the last of it," replied Wilborn."

"And Strait haint heard the last of it either," remarked a bystander.

Several people who heard the conversation laughed heartily, and as the story is being told about the grounds it is very much enjoyed.

SENATOR TILLMAN.

Friday, although the weather was unfavorable, there were perhaps two thousand people present, many coming long distances to swell the visitors from the county and the number who spent the night on the grounds.

When we arrived at the stand Col. D. P. Duncan, agent of the State Alliance, was engaged in a discussion of alliance principles and was listened to with much interest. We heard but little of his address, however.

While he was in the midst of his speech the train from Blacksburg rolled up, having aboard Senator Tillman and Governor Ellerbe, reinforced by three coaches of men and women from the country above.

Senator Tillman had not long been upon the stand when he was introduced to the audience, to which he assuredly needed no introduction. He was received, as he was when he stepped off the train, with great cheering. He looked the same "Old Ben" as of yore and spoke with his accustomed ease and energy. He began by referring to the fact that he had had his political birth only a few miles from that spot eleven years ago and spoke in kindly terms of the people of the neighborhood. He was not a politician; if he were he would come here to deal in platitudes and generalities, but he came with his pack full of rocks, and threw some of them. He made a very vigorous defence of the dispensary law and it was evident that he intends to sink or swim with the law. There are other statesmen who on account of it have taken to the bushes—they do not know whether it is right or not. He fathered all responsibility for the law: he nursed it and held it up; had stood by it, defended it against all the attacks in the courts, in the Darlington war and is now standing by it in the Senate. If hard work and faithful effort can have influence his bill, recently defeated in the House, will yet pass Congress.

He jumped on the preachers vigorously for opposing the law, because as they say, its a shame for the State to be selling whiskey. They stand alongside the bar keepers in their opposition—the devil at one end of the rope and the preachers at the other, trying to choke the law to death. They have allied themselves with Gonzales, Hemphill, Simonton and the devil.

There was stealing in the dispensary because of the divided responsibility, but that there was also dishonesty elsewhere. We have thieving cashiers in the banks, thieving clerks in the stores, thieving county treasures, clerks of courts and auditors; in fact corruption is found in every form of Government, and it is unfair to hold the dispensary management up to scorn as the only trust in which there is stealing.

He made a defence of Governor Ellerbe in which there is but little room for misunderstanding. He had known the Governor for a long time and he was his personal and political friend; he was an honest man and truthful, and he had no idea he had gone to lying at this late day. The Governor had been criticised in his action about the metropolitan police. It had been said that the Governor had a deal with the Charleston people, promising to remove the police in return for their support. He did not believe it. Two days after the Legislature met in January he had a friendly interview with Governor Ellerbe and advised him not to remove the police unless every member of the Charleston city counsel would sign an agreement to see the law enforced. The Governor said he would not, and he did not think he had turned out to be a liar and a hypocrite. He avowed responsibility for the metropolitan police. In his last message to the Legislature he pointed out the importance of the adoption of such a law and recomended it.

He invited questions from the audience and several were fired at him. One as to his preference for U. S. Senator met with the response that that was his business and he was trying to attend to it, and the questioner had better do the same.

Mr. W. H. Lawrence of Laurens asked him if his and McLaurin's views were the same on tariff issues. He answered by saying that he and McLaurin bad voted alike in every instance on the tariff issues. They had both voted for the two dollar tariff in lumber, for the duty on cotton and the duty on rice. He had gone a little further than Senator McLaurin, but was more honest than McLaurin. He had advocated a head tax—$1000 per head on all foreign emmigrants, but McLaurin thought it was straining democracy and deserted him in that instance only. That question is not dead, however, and he intends to press it again.

He avowed that he had said he would vote for the Dingley bill if his vote be necessary to pass it, but his vote was not necessary and he cast his vote against it. He would have voted for that bill because he believed its adoption would overthrow the Republican party and restore the Democracy to the control of the government. He told the Republicans when he voted for the tariff on lumber, rice and cotton that it was a steal, but as the Dingley bill dispensed spoils to all other sections. he and McLaurin thought they would grab as much of the pie as they could for their own people. Free trade is a myth—a will-o'the-wisp. It cannot be had without taxation. The government must be supported—if not by the tariff then by a tax direct upon the people, and he rather thought the people had enough of that already.

He was listened to attentively by those who were close enough to hear. Those who were not seemed bent upon preventing others from hearing.

It was evident that the Senator is still lord and master of the hearts of all his old followers.

GOVERNOR ELLERBE.

Governor Ellerbe had been advised by his physicians not to speak, but he was introduced amid much applause. The matter of the metropolitan police had been referred to by Senator Tillman and he felt called upon to say that when he took the oath of office he pledged himself to enforce the dispensary law, as well as all other laws. That he had tried to do. He had made no deal—no private deal or promise—to any man to remove the metropolitan police in return for the vote of Charleston, nor had he made any deal to remove the police if Charleston would vote for McLaurin, and no man could look him in the face and say so. He thought it unfair for any man to go from the mountains to the sea and make charges against him, your Governor, when he was in his office attending to his duties and had no opportunity of reply. He expected to be a candidate for re-election and then would be the time to make charges. He had expected to remove the police, but not unless
