

TAFT AND GOETHALS TOGETHER IN WHITE DUCK.

NOW and then one finds an old-looking photograph. Mark Twain used to be the only man who safely could wear white clothes in winter. President Taft has succeeded in doing so this winter without peril to his health or his reputation, but it was down in the Panama canal zone, where Twain never likes three tips or thins toes, that he did it. When General Goethals, the army engineer who is building the big canal, the president benevolently paused long enough for the photographer to get a snapshot in white duck—to take a picture of the two colonels. General Goethals, as you will see from his likeness, is a man of indubitable countenance, like his larger and more noted comrade. He was showing the president some special feature of the big ditch and apparently both were pleased. It is certain, at any rate, that he was not objecting to the fortification of the canal. Otherwise President Taft's smile, instead of being broad, would have been as narrow as a rapids with relation to his face as is the isthmus of Panama with relation to North and South America.
