Soliloquies of Old J. D. Moore.

Well, I think we will get our street fixed at last. The contractors gave it up and the city has taken it in charge and I DO believe they will finish it yet. Being torn up all summer has cut off our country trade but we are still living and looking for better times this fall. Greenville is a good town and I have some fun here to mix with my trouble.

There was a widow woman passed here the other day and said to me, "You ought to marry." I told her that I did not know, that my maiden name was J. D. Moore and that it had stuck to me through my first wife's lifetime. She asked me how old I was. I told her that I was getting well up in years, but that if she had a kiss for me she would find me young again.

Well, we have a few thieves over here for a negro stole five dollars out of my drawer. I soon found out and sent for him and he acknowledged and promised to pay me back, but the man he worked for told him not to pay it, that I could not prove he got it. I told him that he had better pay me, for I was long-headed and hard-headed, too. So the negro employed a lawyer; paid him $5 and then had to pay a fine of $5. I told them then if they would return my money I would let them off. They said they had done paid the fine, and it was settled. I told them only in one degree; that I would try him in the state court. So I have got it fixed, and will try him again. He had a lawyer and a cobbler, but "Old J. D." was smart enough for both. The man the darkey worked for was the cobbler, a next-door neighbor, or something in place of a neighbor. This may not sound good to him, but "Old J. D." don't care.

Well, I was well pleased to see the well-known face of Miles Allgood, who called to see me one day last week. The genial Miles is always welcome to the board of "Old J. D."

M. W. Hester Converted.

Well, I haven't written for the P. S. J. for some time, so I had better begin and let it know what I have been doing.

I have been fencing, taking advantage of the prohibition law, and I find not many laws can be made that a man can't take advantage of and be benefited.

Five years ago I took the stump and fought prohibition; told the people that I knew of one distillery that put over 1,000 cattle and hogs on the market of our little towns annually, and I wanted a still just like it on every branch in Pickens county; that if prohibition came in vogue we would have no less whisky but much less meat and lard, and that some of us will not be able to butter both sides of our bread.

Only a short while and I began to understand the great cry of the high cost of living. Why, it wasn't surprising to me, counting the freights and a half score of men handling it, from producer to consumer. So I went to work to make what I could out of the prohibition law. I put about 70 acres under hog wire fence, sowed most of it down to small grain, grazed it with my hogs until late in the spring, and then turned them back for a short time and let them eat a portion of the grain. Then I turned the stubble and sowed 40 acres to peas, both early and late varieties, and now the peas are nearly ready to turn back, and I aim to get 15c a pound for them this time; got 15c last year.

The people tell me to plant root crops for my hogs, and I tell them that I don't want my land rooted up; besides, I have bred my hogs to graze, and I don't know whether they would root after pinders or potatoes, should I plant them, and then there's the work. I am really not afraid of any competition.

Some of our people are too rich, some too poor, some too old and some too lazy. Hogs, you know, require personal attention. Ah, unless the distilleries come back, and I think the preachers, the blind tigers and myself can keep them voted out.

The demonstration man at Clemson said to feed a hog one-half pound cotton meal a day, and kill him in ten weeks; one-fourth pound a day, and kill him in twenty weeks. I didn't ask him how long it took cotton seed compound to kill a man.

Respectfully, M. W. H.
