

POETRY.

The Thunder Storm.

Hark! how the heavy Thunders roll! They fill with awe th' astonished soul; Loud peals tremendous strike the ear. And, crashing in the heart with fear? The vivid flash electric flies Resistless bright—to mortal eyes;— Anon reverberating roll'd That voice which shook that neither world! In torrents pour the dashing rain, Impetuous o'er the delug'd plain; In floods the inundation pours Tumultuous, as the thunder roars; 'Tis HE, whose mighty outstretched arm, Shakes terror in this dread alarm; Whose pow'r the elements controls,— Awakes with fear our trembling souls. And in his thunder bids us hear, That God omnipotent is near!

AMUSEMENT.

DANDY ACCIDENT.

A few days since, as one of these strait faced, stiff necked things, known under the appellation of Dandies, was fluttering down Sackville-street, Dublin, and at the same time ogling a fair Dandy, who was tripping along on the "light fantastic toe," a great mastiff dog rushed suddenly between his legs, and threw him off his balance so completely, that he tumbled headlong into a stay-maker's shop. While a crowd was collecting round the door, anxiously inquiring whether the "lady-like gentleman" was hurt, another Dandy passing by saw his brother "Exquisite" lying prostrate in the shop, and having with difficulty hustled through the mob, reconnoitered it for some time, and at length exclaimed, in a voice of sympathy, "aw! aw! it's a Dandy!—Poor thing! give it air—unlace its stays—unite its cravat—Poor thing? it's a Dandy!" However, by the operations of unlacing, untying, and a judicious application of smelling bottles, the poor sufferer was at length set to rights, and conveyed home in a coach, heartily cursing the Gothic ignorance of the dog, which could not instinctively distinguish a Dandy from a man. Irish paper.

An old man who had seen something of the world, and who was desirous that his son should profit by his experience, told him that nothing was more important in the conduct of life, than to do every thing in its proper order and place. "For instance," said he, "if you desire to settle in the world, get first a house, then a wife, then a child." The young man, however, profited as little by this short lesson, as the son of the Earl of Chesham, profited by his lordship's voluminous lesson, for he got first a child, then a wife, and then a house.

Philetas of Cos, about the time of Alexander the Great, had a body of such exceeding leanness and lightness, that he commonly wore shoes of lead, and carried lead in his pockets, lest at some time or other he should be blown away by the wind. This man was an eminent critic and poet.
