

effort to overthrow law and order, in the vain hope of securing an equivalent, by the results of a bloody revolution. The public mind is now fully alive to this great matter; every one can see the importance of living under a government of laws; and all eyes are now turned in the direction from whence they hope this great boon may be attained. This generation will never find any adventure, which will be held enough to advise the overthrow of the government; unfortunately for him, all classes of society know too much of bloody facts to listen any more to artfully spun theories. That day has gone by, and therefore in the present temper of the people, it is not wise, or generous, to throw a straw in the way of the hundreds of thousands, whose judgments are convinced, and who are now anxious to accept the protection to be found under the constitution and laws of their forefathers. Every true patriot will be willing to open wide the door, that is again to receive back the thoughtless wanderer from his home, grown better and wiser from his cruel experience. It is sincerely to be hoped, that no one, exulting in the display of authority, will be permitted for anything that is past, to shut that door, and drive to desperation as enemies, those who seek to enter it as friends.

FOR THE NEW ERA.

Mr. Editor:—In your issue of this day there is a communication of the signature of "EONOX," in regard to the Amey Spain case, which seems to be mainly designed as a denial of statements, in your previous number, by several citizens of this place, which you have emphatically endorsed, and a pious criticism on the temper of the Pastor of the Darlington Methodist Church. Now if your little man of the pen would only have the courage to come out from behind the tree, and show himself in all his manly proportions, I might make him say best, for, being so special in his attentions to the unprotected "parson," isn't he guilty of bushwhacking to all intents and purposes? The first case that has come to my notice in South Carolina, since the close of the war, excepting the author of the Harper romance. No wonder that his shot has scattered, and that nobody is hurt; for I suppose that it is right hard for a man from the wrong side of a tree, to do much execution without exposing his own precious self, and especially when his nerves are quivering with apprehension. He may have been in the front rank of many a hard fought battle, or ought I know, but as an obliged to class him with the first theorists. And as it is hard to hit a little man behind a tree, I will not return his fire; but with your permission, Mr. Editor, just twig him a little, if I can get high enough, and let him off for this time. I doubt whether his another eye him as much as might have been.

I should not notice this anonymous scribbler, but for the fact, that I am and have been only anxious that the public at a distance shall know the simple naked truth in the matter. Will you allow me to guess why there is such sensitive anxiety that the account in the Weekly shall be believed to be true? Because it would be a clever contribution to the capital stock of the Redicals, or haters of the Southern people. Overturning the whole matter to an issue, in a short way, I demand that "EONOX," and the author of the article in Harper's Weekly shall give you their own performances, and the names of all "citizens and Confederate soldiers," who have with malice of rethought tried against their own people, that we may know who they are, and whether they are worthy of confidence. There are a few in almost every community so utterly debased and destitute of home feeling, that they will join the mad dog against their fellow-citizens; and there are those who, like the scavenger, will for pay go and sweep people's back yards for all the filth they can gather. "EONOX," evidently without design, betrays himself as being from some other quarter of the globe than this, and if he has unwisely turned scavenger, and gathered up a load of falsehood, he must not hold me responsible for his bad luck. Why did not these reporters for the Northern ear, get some information from their sources? Why? I must correct my fellow-citizen for one or two serious mistakes. I have not named the "unknown" N. S. Edwards, the sketcher, in my note to Major Spauld; nor did I for one moment suppose that he had any thing to do with the affair in the Weekly, except getting up the picture. I presumed that some one else wrote that highly rhetorical statement. How then could I call Edwards a liar? I did not intend to call any one by that epithet, but he who originated the slander, and he who aided and abetted in it. If any one has been deceived, after taking the pains to know the truth, he does not fall under my censure. I would also touch the man behind the tree a little on other points. We have men "in our midst" from New England, and as I am informed from nearly all the European States, perhaps some from Asia itself. I have not even intimated that the author of the slander hails from any one of these localities. Read my statement again. Why then does any little man from the other side of the tree charge me with "not beginning at home to find fault?" Ask the people of my flock if I don't find fault with them when it is needed. Does he believe that the writer was not a citizen of Darlington?

I have but a few words more in regard to myself. It is the first time in fifty-two years that I have been held up in a newspaper as in any way having identified myself with falsehood. My natural temperament strongly influences me to shrink from notoriety even in that which is good. I am more conscious of the imperfections of my Christian spirit and character than any one can possibly be for me. It is possible that my indignation at the outrageous wholesale slander of the citizens of Darlington, may have induced me to use some words too strong for a Christian minister. I am not convinced of it, however. I have been instructed by my parents and teachers to call men and things by their right names. And to show that I have not utterly departed from the spirit and teachings of "the meek and lowly Saviour," whom I humbly desire ever to make my Exemplar, and to recommend to others as such; I cite the attention of readers to pointed strong words addressed by Him to certain characters, as follows: John, 8th chapter, 44 and 45th verse; Matthew 23rd chapter, 33rd verse.

Mr. Editor, I am not a man of war, nor do I desire ever to trouble you or your readers with another word on this matter, and it does not concern me for myself one moment, whether Harper believes me or not, for I have not written with the fear of Harper or any other man before my eyes. I have been recently informed by intelligent Christian gentlemen from New England that the intelligence of this section does not credit as truthful more than half the matter of that sheet.

Allow me to say in closing this too long communication, that I regret as painfully as any one else the enormities that may have been practiced by one class of citizens upon another, or as one citizen upon another, but let it be ever remembered that many facts cannot substantiate the truth of one falsehood. If it is clearly established that WINE, whom I take to be a foreigner, has murdered his thousands let him pay the forfeit of his life in any way that humanity requires. And if it can be proves beyond a doubt that the citizens of Darlington and of the whole South have been accomplices in these deeds of darkness, let them take what justice demands. But if the first freedman has been killed by a white man in all the Pee Dee country since the war closed, I do not know of it. The ladies of Darlington, members of my flock, and citizens, need no further defence from me. Major SPAIN, Rev. Mr. DEALER and the other gentlemen can take care of themselves.

W. A. GAMEWELL.
Darlington, S. C., Oct. 10th, 1865.

COMMUNICATED.
Mr. Editor:—Thinking you would not refuse to accept a few plain thoughts from one who has visited the prison pens of Florence which he might learn by observation how the huddled braves lived, died and were buried, I have sent you the following concerning the world-abhorred "STOCKADES" which lies a short distance from Florence, or a railroad junction at that name, which is only beyond these huts we come to the stockade, a past from anything modern or human. A breastwork is thrown up to the height of three feet and extends nearly around the stockade, at the distance of nearly forty rods, forming an almost effectual barrier to escape against all who were confined within its limits. This work is now thrown down in many places. Between the breastwork and the stockade are houses which were occupied by the guard.

These houses (for so I must call them when compared with the dens occupied by the prisoners) would look to the majority of the world as though it would be nearly impossible for any human being—even a soldier—to live in. Yet they were the homes of the company with the quarters occupied by the prisoners.

These houses are built of logs in their rough state, and are laid up in the usual primitive log manner. They were once comfortable quarters no doubt, and of sufficient size to accommodate the guard in all particulars. Passing beyond these huts we come to the stockade, which is well worth the time spent in looking around its scenes of misery and wonder.

There were awakened in our minds as we passed from point to point feelings which the pen, however descriptive, could but feebly portray. The prison enclosure is formed by placing timbers in the ground in an upright position, leaving on the inside a perpendicular wall thirteen feet high. On the outside an embankment of earth is thrown up nearly to the top of the wall, thus giving the person who was stationed on the parapet a full view of all that was taking place in the stockade.

As we entered the enclosure we saw at once where the prisoners were confined. We first came to the commissary sheds which were now nearly destroyed by fire, leaving only the blackened timbers. Just beyond are the huts which were occupied by the prisoners. Only a few of which are yet destroyed.

Passing to the centre of the enclosure we are able to obtain a complete view of the stockade. We find ourselves surrounded by an upright wall thirteen feet high and almost shut in from a view of the country beyond.

The stockade is about thirty rods wide and nearly sixty long, making an enclosure of nearly eleven acres. Running through the centre of the pen is a stream of clear water, which blackened the thirst of those confined within its limits. On one side of the stream is a marsh comprising nearly one third of the area of the enclosure leaving, therefore, only two-thirds for huts. As the ground gradually rises from the stream it becomes firm and is occupied by little huts.

As we looked over the enclosure we beheld the homes of many a brave soldier, showing their earth-covered roofs only a few feet from the ground.

Into this stockade the prisoners were thrust without any means of protection from the scalding heat of the sun or the inclemency of the weather. Forced by the circumstances in which they were placed to seek some protection from the heat and cold, they at once began to prepare for themselves "holes," where they could lay their heads. The earth was usually dug to the depth of one and a half feet, six feet long, and five in width. Such was the soldier's home and formed the walls of his prison den.

It yet wanted a roof; to make which even the fuel that was furnished to the prisoner, was appropriated. The wood was split in fine sticks, and were placed in the form of the letter A over the walls. Upon the roofs were then thrown old rags, roots, or some article otherwise unserviceable, after which the whole was covered with earth to the depth of nearly six inches.

The "home" was then furnished if we except a meagre fire-place built of bricks or adobe dried in the sun. Usually the roof is not over three feet high, and the entrance is scarcely large enough to admit the body of a man. It is not a hut, or rather a hole in the ground, occupied by one man only; it was enough to make one's blood run cold to see where a man once lived. The hole was two and a half feet deep, five long and two wide; over this was laid sticks, covered with earth, forming a roof only a few inches above the ground. It was barely possible for a man to turn in it, and here was the home of some brave soldier, or an earth coffin for a living hero, whose damnable treatment no heart not barbarized could have inflicted. Is it any wonder, that lying on the cold damp ground in these miserable dens, that so many men perished?

Nay, it is rather a wonder that instead of the seven thousand now lying around the stockade, that there was not twice that number. As we look over the field of buried dead and turn our thoughts to the twenty-four hundred and fifty miserable huts in the stockade, we do not wonder that so many of the prisoners found here their last resting place, and we devoutly thank Heaven that the butcheries of the prison pens are at an end.
