She is now at rest.

Sickness came, long years of suffer'g Slowly did she fade away, And her face grew fairer, purer, More unearthly every day,

Till at last one Sabbath eve, Smiling like she was at rest, Did she die, and angels bore her To the mansions of the blest.

Mothers love, so rich and tender, How it's worth is multiplied; By the days of loss and sadness,

That have come since mother died For the very joy and sweetness, Which her presence gave our home Only makes the loss more bitter, Now that we are left alone.

Though I know that she is happy, With the ransomed saints above, Oh how gladly would I purchase

Just one smile of mother's love; Just one smile of sweet affection, Like the one she always wore; Just one gentle word of kindness, Just one kiss if nothing more.

Yet we all will one day meet her In a home more bright than this, And our grief and loss and sadness Be exchanged for perfect bliss, Next to meeting Christ our Savior, Greater joy cannot be given. Than to find that in those mansions

Will be mother, home and heaven.

—HATTIE.

When we look at some women's husbands we truly believe that love is blind, but we can't help thinking what a shock it would be, if they ever regained their sight.
