White House.

This being Cabinet day, none but the heads of Departments were granted an interview with the President. Were it not for the relief from daily annoyances, afforded by Cabinet meetings, on Tuesdays and Fridays, no physical constitution, however strong, could endure the exhausting labor performed by the President of the United States. There is no office of the Government so burdened with responsibility and anxiety, and no man living required to listen to such an endless recital of private griefs as unsophisticated visitors pour into the President's ear at every public interview. President Johnson has few equals in industry. He rises at six, and until breakfast, which is served at half-past seven, looks over the newspapers. Immediately after breakfast he goes to the Executive apartments and commences the labor of the day. First there are bundles of letters to be read and the replies dictated to the Secretaries. Applications for appointments, promotions, discharges from the army and navy, political advice, petitions for Executive clemency, and innumerable other subjects are disposed of, but before half completed, the visitors have commenced to flock into the ante-rooms and thrust their cards upon him. Pardon seekers swarm on every hand. Former owners of confiscated property pace up and down before the door of the President's room, and females, with indescribable effrontery, insist upon immediate admittance.

After the most important business of the morning has been disposed of, the visitors are admitted one by one, and the President submits himself to the arduous process. This lasts till about half-past one or two, sometimes three o'clock, when the doors of his apartment are opened, and the whole crowd admitted. At such times, Col. Johnson, son of the President, or Col. Browning, the Private Secretary, stands near the President, and takes memoranda as dictated by him on the cases of the visitors who succeed one another with subjects for Executive action, like the dense throng at the post-office window. The President's manner at such times is always pleasant, and gives confidence to the most timid. His decisions are quick, and each individual who lays his case before the President learns in half a dozen courteous words the final decision. When all have been listened to, and the halls are once more empty, the President turns again to papers on his table, until four o'clock, the hour for dinner. After dining, he returns to his office, and there generally remains until a late hour, seldom retiring before eleven o'clock.

In addition to all these duties, it must be remembered that there are distinguished visitors constantly presenting themselves. Representatives of Foreign Courts, Governors, Senators, Generals, and hundreds of lesser magnitude must be received, each having some important subject requiring care and deliberation, while over all towers the great and ever present problem of reconstruction. Cabinet days and the Sabbath afford three days of rest from the petty and exhausting annoyances that beset the President, but at no time is he free from the oppressive weight of national difficulties which now, more than ever before, obscure the future.

Adams & Co.'s Express Company has loaned $2,000,000 of its accumulated capital to several of the Southern railroads, and has thus enabled them to resume operations. This liberality can but be appreciated by the communities thus benefited.

It strikes us that Adams & Co.'s Express is wise in its generation.

Somehow we have a sort of notion that this liberality will be made to pay. Say, for instance, that a new Express Company called the "National Express Company," is started under auspices that commend it to the popular support say, in short, that it is likely to be a formidable competitor for public favor. Is it not possible, that in view of this probable competition, some arrangements may have been made with the companies, that must prove highly advantageous to Adams' Express? We think we have heard that the new company encountered some difficulties referable to this cause. We do not find fault with Adams' Express for exacting a quid pro quo, but we do not quite believe in the liberality business. That sort of thing is played out, and has been for some time.
