A CRIME UNDER NOVEL CIRCUM-STANCES.—The Delle Marche gives an odd account of a woman named Marie Capanori, aged fifty-seven, who has had the bad taste to murder her husband, a man of seventy. So far, this act was by no means an uncommon one, but the crime becomes more novel when we learn that it was committed under the impulse of maternal affection. This couple had a son, a soldier in the army, and the woman, being distressed at his long absence, inquired by what means she could get him released from service, and was informed that he would not be the service. and was informed that he would only be released when she became a widow. To remove the obstacle formed by her To remove the obstacle formed by her husband, she one day pushed him over a precipice, near the edge of which he was working. Although there was no proof of her guilt, she, nevertheless, strange to say, confessed all, when closely questioned by the authorities. It is scarcely necessary to add, that the worthy son will remain in the army, and his amiable mother be subjected to a
