DAILY PHŒNIX

BY ALLAN A. SELBY

No. 100 Main St., Second Story.

A singular man was the Bishop of Havana, whose death is just announced by telegraph. The dispatch tells us that this Bishop had left behind him by public subscription, as he left nothing, having given all his possessions to the poor. Queer, was it not? Some people will say he was a very foolish man. He had plenty of chances to make money, which he might have put out at interest till it grew to be a fortune. He had a good salary, which he might have hoarded up, and by which he might have become rich like Astor. But, instead of doing any of these things, the Bishop had given all of his property away to the poor, and had never enough to pay the expenses of his funeral. He died of the yellow fever, which is raging in Havana. He did not run away from the city because the yellow fever raged in it, but remained there for the sake of his flock, who were falling victims to it.
