Selected Poetry.

From the Baltimore Sun. THE WEARY HEART. BY MRS. C. H. CRISWELL. My heart is weary with its sadness, With its sadness and its gloom-Has it ever known sweet gladness? Has contentment there found room?

Aye! years ago-when life was dearer-Days when hope shone like a star: Hours that brought gay moments nearer, While grief's shadows dwell afar.

But now my heart is weary, weary-Fainting with its weight of pain; Life is but a desert dreary, Hope will ne'er come back again.

Sweet childhood days are gone forever-Youthful joys forever fied; Love, first love, returneth never-Buried in the heart-'tis dead.

Turn, turn, thou weary heart to heaven; Peace dwells in thy God alone-Send thou forth at morn, at even, Prayerful thoughts unto His throne.

----A CHILD'S PRAYER. BY ARICE CARY. Sweeter than the songs of thrushes, When the winds are low: Brighter than the spring-time blushes, Reddening out of snow, Were the voice and check so fair, Of the little girl at prayer.

Like a white lamb of the meadow, Climbing through the light; Like a priestess in the shadow Of the temple bright, Seemed she saying "Holy One ! Thine, and not my will be done !"

Deep and Sub-soil Plowing. BELL-ESPOIR MODILE CO, ALA. ? June 21, 1853.

PROF. Jas. J. MAPES-Dear Sir .: - Since aboat the first of March we have suffered a drought unprecedented at this season. For nearly four months there has been but one rain and for over three, not a shower sufficient to lay the dust. You can judge of the effects of such a drought in a section where skinning the surface is the universal practice. I know of many fields of corn from which a dozen good coasting ears cannot be found to the acre. As I am the only one in my neighborhood who has enjoyed roasting ears and water melons this season, and my case illustrates the benefit of deep working, I will dwell a little on it. About the first of March, I prepared a patch for melons, by spading the ground a good fourteen inch in depth. On this I planted corn in rows eight feet apart, and from two to three feet in the rows, and melons between the rows. The melons were the crop aimed at, and the corn was planted as an accessor for shade to the melons and roasting ears. A patch was prepared in stiff ground in like manner, with the addition of open ditches, about the middle of the same month, and planted. No other culthre was given, than keeping the surface mellow and free of grass with the hoe. From both these patches I have enjoyed, and am still enjoying, both melons and roasting ears, of fair size and excellent quality, although patch No. 1 received but one rain, (just after it was planted) sub-soil, are 1st, The greater draught power required. 2d That the sub-soil will form an inferior bed for the reception of seeds. To this I answer, that the more perfect disintegration, greater and more permanent porosity gained by the use of the plow throwing up the soil, will compensate for the greater draught required. That if a liberal and proper manuring be applied to the ground after subsoiling, the soil will be good enough for any seeds I know of used as field crops ; likewise that the benefit accruing from the more perfect disintegration, and from the admixture of the surface and subsoils, will more than compensate for any imagined inferiority in this respect. Finally, that this objected inferiority holds good at most for the first year, the advantages accruing being on the contrary.

To conclude, I hold that the making of a single crop being the end in view, it may be sufficient to divide the sub soil; but permanent amelioration of the subsoil being the end in view, the more completely the subsoil is mixed with the surface or brought up, the better.

If my remarks seem to you futile, or behind the agricultural science of the age, I beg leave to suggest they are as good as you could reasonably expect from a section which is ignorant of sub soil plows, and votes agricultural papers a bore.

With sincere respect, J. J. DELCHAMPS. [The above article may be read with profit by Northern as well as Southern farmers. Our correspondent is right as to deep surface plowing for many soils, and thus giving the portions of sub soils raised, the advantages consequent upon contact with the atmosphere; but in some cases it is better to both surface and subsoil, not elevating the sub soil except by the gradual deer ening of the surface plowing, so as not to exchange the carbonaceous matter of the surface for the alumina he refers to, more rapidly than it can be supplied with carbon. He will find by experiment that carbon and alumina will retain ammonia much better than alumina alone. In some soils, however, even deep trenching is advisable, reversing the soil to a depth of even three feet, as in old, and rich garden soils with free and valuable subsoils. As to deep disintegration securing crops from d:ought, it is no longer a question of doubt.

We subsoil all our land and have never suffered from drought.

Mr. Delchamps will be of more real service to the farmers of Alabama, by making his views known to them, than will all those who vote agricultural papers a bore.]-ED.

The poor fellow was a disgusting object of pity; he was a moving mass of sores. The other negroes could not remain in the same place with him. and No. 2 has never been wet since the seeds were put in the ground.

To show the depth to which certain roots will descend in a dry season, I will state that from a field planted in beets, carrots, and parsnins, about the last of January, and which received no rain since the 3-1 or 4th day of March I pulled a parsnip, the root of which measured three feet eight inches, the end breaking off at a point where it was the size of my little finger. Frequent specimens have I dug measuring from two and a half to three feet. In spite of the drought, I have had fine beets also from the · same field, although I confess the crop has not turned out as I had reason to expect when I planted, nor as it would have done with a good season. Of the three, the carrots seem to have done the best, though both my beets and parsnips are quite as good as are generally seen in this section. The ground in which they were planted, had been thoroughly worked to an unusual depth; in quality it is a fine light loam. Having confined myself so far to facts, permit me to indulge a little in theory. I see with surprise that Northern farmers object to sub soil plows on account of their turning up the sub-soil, and that these are now improved so as merely to disintegrate it without turning it up. How is this? Is not spade culture ad. mitted to be superior to any other, and is not the trenching of ground to a great depth (the Palings 5 ft. long by 3 in. wide, per 100 soil being completely reversed,) resorted to in gardens as the very best means of improving them? I hold that the more perfectly the subsoil is brought to the surface the better, and give the following as my reasons for that opinion:

1st. The sub-soil being merely divided at the cd to order at short notice; also, slats for blinds, sash-depth of fourteen or more inches, and left at es, doors, &c. and palings of every description. that depth, will be but little affected by the atmosphere, and rain admitted. In the course to the above rates. of time it will again pack and renew its former condition, or very near it. If, on the contrary, it be brought to the surface, it will receive and benefit by all the ameliorative influences of the atmosphere, rain, solar heat, &c. Its texture will be changed and finally it will become surface soil. But the top soil turned, undergoes no deterioration but by its porosity, greater than that of the sub-soil ; however well divided, it will admit the atmospheric influences even to the soil under it.

2d. The above positions being correct, it fol lows that the land will be more easily subsoiled again when required, and also that a less frequent use of the sub-soil plow will be needed.

3d. The subsoil containing a greater portion of alumina, (if not of earbon and sulphates,) is the best calculated to retain the ammonia received from the atmosphere in rain, &c., and the most efficient in preveniing the evaporation of the volatile manures applied to the soil.

4th. If the soil is of too light a texture, and inform them that they still continue the business stiff, by thorough disintegration and frequent exposure of the different strata to the atmosphere, the too great tendency will be des-
