

A Juggler in Turkey.

The exemplification of the adage, when in Turkey you must do as the turkies do, is given in the Providence Journal. The reputation of Simmons, the magician, had preceded him to Constantinople, and the Sultan commanded his appearance. The Ornithological Paradox, in which the magician cuts off the heads of a black and white pigeon, and sends them flying each with the other's head, concluded the entertainment. The Sultan had watched the movements of the dexterous prestidigitateur; then turning to an officer, gave an order in a whisper. The officer disappeared, and soon returned with a large Damascus yatagan, glittering as a sunbeam. A royal gift, thought Simmons. In a moment two slaves appeared, one white, the other black. "Now," said the Sultan, "that we may see that thy skill does really surpass that of all the magii in the world, let the head of the black slave be placed on the shoulders of the white and the pale face on the black."

The slaves trembled no more than the astonished Simmons. Recovering, he lifted the weapon high in the air, and then suddenly let it fall again. "Why does the Giaour delay?" impatiently asked the Sultan. "Your Majesty will pardon me," was the cool reply; "I had only prepared myself to perform the feat with pigeons; with human beings great preparation is necessary. I must procure a sacred herb, which is only ripe for the purpose at a certain season of the moon. It yet lacks ten days of the time. Grant me that time and I will perform your royal wish." The Sultan seemed disappointed, but said: "We accord the Giaour ten days." By the assistance of the French Minister, Simmons obtained a passport, and in a few days was beyond the dominions of the Sultan of Turkey.
