So ...on as the senses are developed, the exter...al universe makes impressions by sight, feels, sounds, smells and tastes: these impressions are telegraphed to the centre of perception in the brain, the perception of which by the "myself," is called memory.

These facts, with all their importance and direct bearing on our individual and ...character, are, in general, overl... and neglected; or, what is much ...difference between the mother's smile of love and ...probation, and the frown of displeasure;—the child has experienced both; and by a degree of reasoning, understands the nature of both expressions. More real knowledge is gained in the first two years, than is generally acquired in the next six years of early life.

in the child as in the man. This being the fact, it is evident that moral culture should commence almost before the child ceases to draw its nourishment from the mother's breast. This is the time to control their bad inclinations, subdue their unruly passions, and train them to obedience, and submission to the parent's will. This is the time to commence that moral teaching which
