

POETRY.

BY W. R. TIMMONS.

Oh! senseless and cold is the bosom of stone.
That heaves not a rapturous sigh of delight,
When, after long absence the scenery known
In the morning of infancy, beams on the sight!
How sad, tho' how sweet, to the feelings that sigh!
'Tis an ecstasied pleasure no language can speak,
And the tear at that moment, which falls from
the eye,
Adds a sorrowful grace to the wanderer's cheek.
Tho' long I have wandered, exiled and forsaken,
In want, thro' each clime, from the line to the pole,
Of poverty heedless, in trouble unshaken,
One cherished idea supported my soul;
'Twas this—tho' misfortune and care without number,
I'm doomed to endure in my journey on earth,
Yet when in the grave this worn body shall slumber,
My soul will return to the land of my birth.

Superstitious terror.—The following story is recited in the Baltimore American, from an English paper—"In a garrison in England, in the night, a person was suddenly taken very ill, and the doctor had no other method of giving relief, but to send to his store at some distance for the requisite medicines; for this purpose he employed an old woman to execute this commission. In order to protect herself from the night air, and to prevent the candle from going out, she covered herself with a blanket; having occasion to pass near to a sentinel on his post, the soldier looked with amazement and terror at the approaching figure, and his bewildered imagination converted the lady into the devil, with a tail, cloven feet, and belching red hot flames from his mouth. Suddenly he threw down his musket, and took to his heels, loudly crying that he had seen old Satan coming to take him soul and body! He actually died by the fright in about a quarter of an hour afterwards. Yet this man had served with reputation in all the wars in the Peninsula, and had fought at the battle of Waterloo."

From the Richmond Enquirer, October 5.
A Hoax.—On Saturday last, a man arrived in this city in the northern stage, who passed himself off by the name of Vanhorn, and as the friend of a Mr. Venette, "recently from France." Vanhorn advertised the "Grand Exhibition of an Air Balloon," to rise on Thursday last at two o'clock, near the Capitol, and Venette was to remain suspended 200 feet in the airy regions. Poor Venette was infirm, had lost his property twice by fire, and had recourse to this expedient for the support of his "numerous family." Vanhorn played his part to perfection.—With the greatest sang froid he observed "that he was sorry to undertake this business, that he had his own transactions to attend to, that nothing could induce him to attend to it, but a grateful wish to assist Mr. Venette, who had once rendered him a service in Philadelphia; that Venette was engaged about the balloon, and could not act in the distribution of the tickets; and that all he should do in the affair, was to deliver the tickets into the hands of certain gentlemen, who would receive the money, and return it, if the Exhibition should fail." What next? Vanhorn takes these tickets himself; carries them around, and sells a considerable number for fifty cents a piece; and on Wednesday night, takes a seat in the Northern Mail Stage, ostensibly for "The Oaks" only saying that he should return next day; draws out his baggage clandestinely in the night from his apartment; bids the tavernkeeper, the printer, and the public—and vanishes.—

Nothing heard of him since!—On Thursday, two o'clock, a considerable crowd assembled on the Capitol Square—but, no Venette, no Vanhorn, no balloon, no apparatus, greets their sight, and they find it all a Hoax!—only a villainous edition of the Philadelphia Hoax.
This Monstieur Vanhorn, this Prince of Pick-pockets, has a northern aspect, dark complexion eyes and hair, about 25 years of age, and about five feet ten inches in height—His dress black; and demeanor smooth and genteel. He will be fortunate if he yet escapes being "suspended TEN feet in the airy regions."

His plunder estimated at 2 or 300 dollars.
