The Yankee outwitted.—During the late war, when provisions were at the highest pitch, Monsieur and a Yankee, both residing in a seaport town in Maine, purchased together a fresh hog, dressed for cooking. Some difficulty arising between them as to the manner of dividing it equally, the Yankee, thinking to outwit the Frenchman, proposed to cut him across the middle, and then he would turn round, while the Frenchman should place his finger on the one part or the other, as he pleased, and say, "who shall have this?" He then should answer, not knowing which part; thus leaving it entirely for chance to decide. But Monsieur, while the Yankee turned his back to decide, dexterously cut off the tail, and clapping it in the mouth of the hog, exclaimed, "Who shall have that got a tail in him?"—"I," says the Yankee—"By gar you may have 'em," answered Monsieur. The poor Yankee was mortified indeed, when he found himself taken in his own trap; while the Frenchman, smiling his sides with laughter, added more, to his vexation, by exclaiming, "By gar dat is triek de Napoleon."

On the Boston Evening Intelligencer.

An Accomplished Scoundrel!

A fellow, of German origin, was sent to the State Prison last week for the term of four years, whose iniquity in deceit, fertility in his designs and address in executing them has few parallels in this, and we believe in any other country. His real name is Lewis, and he was sentenced to the State Prison about five years since, but was pardoned not long ago on account of good behaviour.

Having hurried once more into the world, this Chevalier d'industrie, began to follow the bent of his genius, which was not so much directed to theft, highway robbery, or burglary, as to swindling and fraud of a high and more distinguished character. He had formerly been successful in personating the part of a ship master from the West Indies, under which disguise he found means to furnish an unwary look-keeper, and he again determined to become a villain, and prey upon the plenty and fat of peace.

Having dressed himself in a proper garb for the purpose, on the 9th of April he went into a tavern in Battery-March street, with a porter or handcartman, and asked for lodgings. He observed he had just arrived from France, in the ship Maria, of which vessel he was master, with a cargo of wines, brandy and silks. He remarked, if he should take lodgings there he should wish at the same time to find a convenient place to store some brandy and cases of silks;—but professing great indifference as to the price of the accommodation. He talked with some importance to the cart-man, brooding him, after having selected his sleeping room and agreed upon taking a part of his cellar for his goods, to go to the ship Maria, lying at the Long-wharf, for the trunks belonging to captain Smith.—While the porter was gone for the luggage, the fringed Capt. Smith here thought he had better proceed and
