Amusement.

A curious adventure happened lately to a French ventriloquist conjurer, at Kribourg, in Switzerland. So great was the illusion of his ventriloquism among the peasantry, of that country, that in the above named town, they were on the point of throwing him into a lighted oven, taking him for a sorcerer, as such only fit to be burned; when he had the presence of mind, to frighten them still more in this critical moment, by causing to come from the oven the most dismal groans and cries; which had such an effect on their credulity that they threw him down; and he embracing the opportunity, collected all his strength, and ran off as fast as his legs could carry him.—London paper.

Keat's Lecture.

The brave Crillon, one of the greatest captains of Henry the Fourth, was hearing a discourse upon the passions, and the preacher giving a very pathetic description of the scourging of our Saviour, the warrior was moved even to tears, and laying his hand on his sword, exclaimed—"O! where wast thou, Crillon? Where wast thou?"
