Only a few moments elapsed ere I was aroused by a warm breath upon my cheek. I looked up in affright, but saw nothing. I arose. My dress caught on a projecting nail. I turned to disengage it, and directly behind me stood Mark, with his arms outstretched to receive me. I was too surprised to move or speak, but I remembered all the past.

'Won't you come to my bosom, birdie?' he asked with the same tone as of old. Your breast is no resting-place for me now, Mark Tiverton,' I answered.

I did not do just right, birdie; but I meant no wrong by leaving you as I did. I was poor; I would not bind your young heart then.
