Never was it more needful to have positive convictions as to right and wrong, and having them, to follow the right.

The best way to learn how to talk is to learn how to think. Even small talk cannot be much of a success without thought.

When wealthy people give way to outbursts of passion it is called nerves; when poor people do so it is called ugly temper.

The nonentity has neither friend nor foe; the strong man makes enemies but he also makes friendships that stand all testing and endure.

The people who never fall are the people who never attempt much. But if they do not fall neither is it possible for them to meet with large success.

The man who minds his own business avoids lots of trouble which would surely come to him if he concerned himself with other people's affairs.

Many people who profess willingness to die for their country would probably be very anxious to live if they were called upon to make the sacrifice.

A woman recently shot her husband because he was lazy. If such punishment or remedy becomes popular what a slaughter there will be in some communities.

To artificially raise the price of ice or milk in hot weather on the plea of scarcity of article is inhuman because it means untold suffering and death to multitudes of babies. Men who make abnormal profits on other commodities that are not such necessities are humane by comparison.

The man who is getting grey with work, and nothing but work, is not a master but a slave. The one imperative thing for him to do is to break the shackles by letting up on the strain and this can best be done by diverting the thought to other channels, and in the summertime, by getting face to face with nature.

The business man who does not advertise has some compensations. He has plenty of time for meditation or to go fishing. He may sit by his store entrance and watch people pass by to trade with his more enterprising competitors. In truth there is nothing to equal abstinence from advertising for giving the merchant ample leisure.

In this country about 70 per cent of the national income is spent in warlike preparations and the results of war which but 30 per cent is spent for all other purposes. If the figures were reversed how much greater would be the comfort and prosperity of the people. And startling as the figures are, they compare favorably with those of other great nations.

Men who cooperate with nature to bring forth its resources for the benefit of humanity, and the men who with same purpose convert raw material into the finished article form the backbone of the country and promote its welfare and prosperity. They, and not Wall Street are the real producers of legitimate wealth and the comfort and well-being of society.

Kansas is in the clutch of the grasshoppers and there is a possibility of a call on the old "warning out" law which requires every person from twelve to sixty years of age to leave his regular work and fight grasshoppers. The Charlotte Observer thinks "such a visitation is calculated to start more people to home seeking in the South than all the back home movements ever launched."

King George of England will add greatly to his popularity by allying himself definitely with the people in the matter of the Lord's veto bill. The striking political events of these past two years in Great Britain show that monarchies must represent the popular will if they are to survive. In its ability to do that, lies in all probability the permanency of the British crown and of British institutions.

So long as land was plentiful and cheap intensive farming was out of the question. Farmers found it cheaper and more profitable to cultivate large areas in a somewhat superficial manner than to go to the expense of extra labor and fertilizers that intensive farming demands. But with the rapid growing population and steady advance in farm values farmers and gardeners will sooner or later find that it will pay them better to get twice the number of bushels of grain from an acre than spread that number over two acres.

Grand Tribute to Bryan.

In concluding a magnificent speech on the floor of the House on the revision of the tariff, Congressman C. B. Randall, of Texas, paid William Jennings Bryan this grand tribute:

Before I take my seat Mr. Chairman, I will say there is one thing I should not overlook. The frequent allusion by gentlemen on that side to a gentleman for whom I am not a spokesman or mouthpiece, but for whom I have the highest respect, challenges my attention. From time to time I have heard surring remarks come across the aisle in reference to the most distinguished Democrat in this country, and it has grated on my nerves. No matter how we may differ in reference to our political views, all men should recognize true manhood and merit wherever they see it.

And if there ever was a man in this country who stood out fairly and openly for what he believed, and who expressed clearly the views on each side of every question he discussed, and who stated with clearness and fairness the arguments for and against, that man is W. J. Bryan. Yet he is abused and hated. I know nothing like it since in ancient times. Aristotles was banished from Athens by a popular vote. His ability and probity stood preeminent. He was called "the Just." But he was banished. If the protectionists and grafters would have their way, Mr. Bryan would have to see some foreign clime.

Mr. Bryan is a devoted Democrat, he is a Christian gentleman, he is a patriot, and he stands high in the United States and in all the civilized world. Why any man should speak slightly of him, I do not know, and I can not understand why gentlemen on that side should refer to him with unfriendly slurs. I suppose that is the price men have to pay for greatness. As Byron expressed it:

He who ascends to mountain tops shall find The loftiest peaks most wrapped in clouds and snow; He who surpasses or subdues mankind Must look down on the hate of those below.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the future vicissitudes of this nation, in the calm and in the storm, when reason rules or passion sways, this same man Bryan will, in all the days to come, stand as a tower of Democratic strength, an imprisonment of civic righteousness.

Like some tall cliff lifts its awful form, Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm; Though round his breast the rolling clouds are spread, Eternal sunshine settles on his head.

There is not a word said by Mr. Randall in the above that is not true. It is a grand tribute to a grand man.

Need of Frequent Rest.

As much as we may regret it, we are compelled to admit that the old time view of Sunday that use to obtain in this country has changed considerably in the past few years, and the end is not yet. Aside from any religious use of the day, the best interests of people demand that one day in seven be differentiated from the rest. Apart from the moral question involved it is certain that the man who works seven days in the week is physically and mentally burning the candle of life at both ends.

This is no new idea. It is as old as the race, and has always been true, and always will be true, we believe as long as the human race remains what it is. In the height of the great French revolution when its leaders declared that everything savoring of religion should be destroyed, the observance of Sunday was officially abolished and one day was substituted as a day of rest and enjoyment. A very few years sufficed to show that the change was injuriously affecting individual life and consequently national life, and a return to the kindlier seventh day resulted.

Where the Sabbath is observed the people are better off in every way. Apply this rule to any country you please and see if it is not true. If for physical and other beneficial reasons a seventh day of rest or recreation was needful in bygone days when the business and social life was not so strenuous, how much more needful is it at the present time when life is at a killing pace resulting in an increasing degree, in nervousness and other ailments. Abolish the Sabbath and you inevitably make a rich man a tyrant and the laborer a slave.

In truth so far from letting work intrude on our Sundays there is really need of greater rest and more holidays if due regard is to be paid to one's health and to the best interests of business and home. For that reason every man who can should set aside all business and go to the woods or mountain or seaside that by getting into touch with nature he may shake off care, and renew his strength that reinvigorated he may take up his duties once more with fresh heart and hope. Of course it means financial expense but it is an expense that makes for true economy and conservation of forces.

Keep Children Young.

It is a sad thing to see a child robbed of its childhood by being forced to go to work to earn a living for itself or parents. Just now some magazines are exploiting the wonderful precocity of some children, and the parents of these children have been airing their methods by which they have enabled the children at the tender age of ten or twelve to absorb as much, or even more, wisdom and knowledge as the average person can do in twice that number of years. It is all very entertaining and interesting, no doubt, but in all probability the methods if generally applied would end in failure. The very rare instances of precocious minds that keep their strength and elasticity to mature years only go to show that the "Admirable" Crich-ton's and Lord Macaulay's are very few and far between. Usually these phenomenal minds degenerate into learned dunces. Anyway the great majority of people will continue to prefer that children shall be children to enjoy life in childish manner and develop naturally along mental and physical lines, and not at the early age of ten talk like men of seventy.
