SOME HOLDOVERS.

We are printing some items in this issue which should have appeared in Tuesday's paper but we just couldn't do it otherwise and that it all there is to it. And in order to keep the record we are printing them today.

NOT CAPTIOUS

What we said about the governor having so many different kinds of vegetables on his table for one meal and what has been said about others who are advising the people to economize and conserve food was not meant as a captious criticism or far that matter as a criticism at all. The point we were trying to make out of the incident is that if the people who are in authority and who are writing appeals every day to the people to conserve food and to economize and have meatless and wheatless days are themselves going on in the same old way of having banquets and big dinners and not themselves practicing what they are preaching their preaching will have very little influence over their audiences. The trouble with most of us is that we want the other fellow to do the economizing and the stinting and the saving while we ourselves go on indulging in the same old extravagances. The people who are writing these appeals to the people to save and who are making speeches about conserving food may be doing it for all we know but with big banquets with extravagant menus as published in the papers does not so impress the public.

SENTIMENT.

In the course of an article on the verdict in the DeSaules case in which Mrs. DeSaules was acquitted for the killing of her husband the Greenville News makes this observation: "To a rare species belongs that man who can divest himself of sentiment and sympathy, casting it aside like a garment. In all the relations of life it is easier to be soft than to be hard, let duty call as it may. There is mercy in the hearts of common men that operates like the principles of equity in the civil law, relaxing the rigor and harshness of the letter of the statute."

And it is well for the human race that such sentiment still exists, and it is to be found more generally in the hearts of those we are sometimes prone to call "common men" than in any other class. We are not intending to say anything about the merits of DeSaules case. What we want to say is, and we have said it many times before that there is need in this world today of more sentiment, not that sentiment which is maudling but that which appeals to our higher nature. A sentiment that will make all the world akin. We as a rule are too harsh in our judgments and estimates of our fellows. It is not because we have a lack of that finer feeling in our natures, but in the mad rush of the world for wealth and power we have failed to cultivate it and develop it. We too often wait to stand around the open grave of a friend to say what we thought of him and wait until his ears are closed forever and his heart is still to say the kind thing we should have said while he could know and appreciate them.

Mrs. DeSaules may have been improperly acquitted. We do not know and we do not pretend to say, but somehow we have felt that if we had been the jury the verdict would have been as rendered by the jury that heard the case.
