No Danger of Infection

Several towns have quarantined against Dillon on account of meningitis. Dillon has had only one case of meningitis and the patient has recovered. The situation is well in hand and there is little or no danger of an epidemic. Dr. Aiken, the war department expert, says there is little danger of contagion. The disease is transmitted by the breath of the person infected. The germ lives only a few seconds after it leaves the mouth and dies if it does not pass into the mouth of another person. The disease is not carried in the clothes and there is not one chance in a thousand of contracting it at a public drinking place. At present, outsiders can come to Dillon with perfect safety.
