A TELEGRAPHIC ERROR.

The Mix-Up it Caused and How a Four of the Crew Were Killed of Man Got Away.

As has been stated, J. H. Adams, who was under arrest in Savannah, escaped being brought to this state probably through a telegraphic error in sending a name. This is probably the first instance of the kind that ever happened in this state or any other.

Governor McSweeney telegraphed the governor of Georgia to have the sheriff of Savannah hold J. H. Adams until he could send requisition papers for him. An hour or two afterwards Candler that he had instructed the sheriff to hold "Williams" as requested. Governor McSweeney was nonplussed for the moment, as he could rather than "Adams," but looking over his telegraphy copy book he found that the name "Adams" was clothing and the name board came there all right. He immediately telegraphed Governor Candler that it was Adams he wanted and not "Williams," and soon after he received a reply saying that the sheriff had been from Brooklyn to Staten Island.
