A Strange Meeting

It Proved an Eventful One

By ARNOLD TRAY

Though we are all apt to realize it, the very thing which has been thought of as a mystery is actually a very simple thing. It is a matter of fact that women are more subject to the temptation than men, because they have not the same physical strength.

To illustrate by a story—a story in which I have a subordinate part. I was in my younger days a "caddy" in a hotel. I presume that if the hotel had then been "thru" I should have traveled in a wheel or a rickshaw, but at that time no such mode of either of these modes of conveyance, and being fond of walking, I walked.

I started one morning from Dresden on my way to Dresden and was walking along the street when I met on the sidewalk a girl about twenty years old whose appearance struck me the moment I looked at her. She was of the German type, with very light eyes and hair. Her apparel was that of a poor girl, but she was very neat and clean.

"Good morning, friend," I said to her. "It seems to me that you should be riding rather than walking."

"And, here, I have not the means to do so," she replied. "I am going to Dresden."

"I have come from Dresden this morning," I said. "The distance is not very far. You cannot do that without being fatigued."

"I am very hungry," she said, looking at me with an eager look in her eyes. "I have not had any food since I left Dresden. In the basket which I took with me, I had only some bread and butter."

"I can suggest an employment," I said. "If you will, I will take you to a restaurant where you can have a good meal."

"I am very grateful to you," she said. "I will go with you."

"I am very glad to see you," she said. "I will go with you."

"I am very glad to see you," she said. "I will go with you."

"I am very glad to see you," she said. "I will go with you."

"I am very glad to see you," she said. "I will go with you."

"I am very glad to see you," she said. "I will go with you."
