

A Triangular Love Difficulty

A War Veteran's Story

By CAPTAIN R. A. MITCHELL

Half a century has passed since we pushed out from the Baginotannock and the little village of Fredericksburg and started up the incline, with scarcely a horse or a tree on it, toward the ridge, its base lined with Confederates waiting for us. But its picture is as sharply defined as my old brain as it was then on my young eyes. What? Go over that ridge again that at a word from the Confederate commander would be swept with a hailstorm of lead and iron? It was awful to think of that, and every night since in my dreams I've been there again.

ed up that incline which, as I have said, seemed to have been especially constructed for moving down anything that happened to be on it. Before putting Jim's body in the ground I took the ring off his finger and put it on my own. I passed it out as with a singular condition. It was as if two girls were waiting for me to come back to them. My teeth had been clenched so tight, and I felt in a measure bound—through my feet—toward the other. But as it was not my habit to try to reason a bridge till I got to it I settled nothing in my mind as to what I would do in the presence. Indeed, it appeared to me that Jim's plan for me and his good-bys, was but a fancy of his which had died with him.

Another week past in the promotion for me was that, not having the natural physical strength, I did not have my full moral strength. I played a deplorable game of hide-and-seek with my nerves and showed that I craved it. At first I got only an indignant horse's snort, but later by little the barriers were broken down between us, and we became lovers.
