

ANDERSON COLLEGE

FOR WOMEN

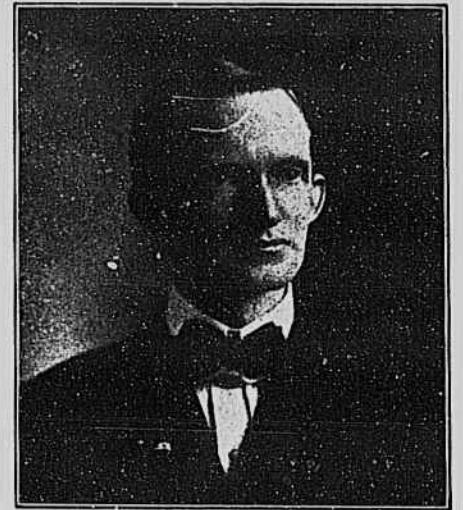

Location.

Anderson College is located in the delightful Piedmont region of South Carolina, in sight of the Blue Ridge Mountains. The dry, bracing air of this section makes it an ideal place for growing girls and boys. The College Plant is on the outskirts of the City of Anderson. The City is in easy walking distance, and the electric railway stops just in front of the Main building.

Being near a city, but not in it, is a distinct advantage to a college. The students are removed from the ordinary distractions of city life. Their health can be better guarded. A larger campus can be secured.

THE EDITORS AT ANDERSON COLLEGE

Just after the recent meeting of the State Press Association at Chick Springs, a few of the editors came over to Anderson. They were entertained by the city, and lunch was served to them in the large dining room of Anderson College. Many nice things were said about the College on the return of the editors to their homes. Following are two "samples" of the kinds of things the editors had to say:

Early next morning two cars, which had been furnished by the Piedmont and Northern were filled with the editors and their friends and a trip made to Anderson. Mr. William Banks, editor of the Anderson Intelligencer, arranged every detail of this outing and was an ideal host. The country traversed was a part of the beautiful Piedmont section. The Interurban passes a number of thriving manufacturing centers. Arrived at Anderson, we editors were hospitably received and entertained at a splendid new institution of learning, Anderson College. Here the president, trustees and their wives and a number of representative citizens conducted their guests over the handsome building. Anderson College is one of the younger colleges for the higher education of young women, but it is doing a great work already. The Baptists of the State have reason to be proud of Anderson College. Plans set on foot by the Anderson Chamber of Commerce led to an offer of $100,000 and a site and the Baptists decided to build the college. The buildings are large and comfortable, the dormitories deserving of especial mention. The rooms are arranged en suite with baths between every two rooms. Though the college is only two years old, it is already well equipped and can easily care for a large number of students. Dr. James P. Kinard, formerly professor of English at the Citadel and also at Winthrop, is president of this thriving institution and he has an excellent corps of teachers.—Lancaster News, July 17th.

MAIN BUILDING AND DORMITORIES.

The last day of the Association's meet was spent in the best town in South Carolina or any other State. We refer to Anderson, whose ever lasting slogan is "My Town." "Billy" Banks, the editor of the Anderson Intelligencer, conducted us over the recently constructed and superior Interurban Railway. We were taken then to the handsome, newly finished "Anderson College for Women." This magnificently appointed and equipped college was a revelation to us. At tremendous cost these Anderson people have established this excellent seat of learning, and the money was raised right in the town, and no sign of debt hangs over it. We inspected the whole building in all its departments, and its modern and thoroughly up-to-date appointments will equal anything in this latitude.—Edgefield Chronicle, July 16th.
