O. HENRY'S STORIES

III--The Pride of the Cities

By O. HENRY

Said Mr. Kipling, "The cities are full of pride, challenging each to each." Even so. New York was empty. Two hundred thousand of its people were away for the summer.

The New Yorker sat at a roof garden table, gazing out through a straw. His hands lay upon a chair. The July sunbeams were scattered among vacant seats as widely as outfielders when the champagne bubbles steps to the plate.

"One man only has been murdered and robbed in Texas City," he nodded slightly to the stranger as the slow power rolled.

cupled four chairs. "Is one of the finest towns in the world." "I presume that you have seen the sights of the metropolis," said the New Yorker.

"Excuse me," said the New Yorker, "but that isn't exactly the point. New York must be a wonderful revelation to a visitor from the west. Now, as to our hotels."

"Have another minute, sir," suggested the New Yorker. "I've never been west, as I said, but I can't be any place out there to compare with New York. As to the claims of Chicago?"

the statistics of Topaz City showed only one carpenter crushed by falling timbers last year, and he was caught in a cyclone. "They abuse our skyline," continued the New Yorker, "and it is likely that we are not yet artistic in the construction of our buildings."

Noted Writer of Short Stories Has Many Callings. O. Henry, who died in June, 1910, had been almost everything in almost every state in the Union. Cowley, sheep herder, merchant, miner, the type man, druggist and reporter--these were a few of the callings he pursued in his peregrinations about the country.
