

THE LITTLE LONE GRAVE.

To our mind there is something exceedingly touching—touchingly simple—in the following picture of a Little Lone Grave, in an over land expedition to California, some four years ago.

The over land emigration to California in 1852, was immense, and attended with much of sickness and death.—Hardly a company that was not decimated, and many doubly so. New-made graves that during the first ten days up the plains, possessed at least a passing melancholy interest, sufficient to turn the steps of the traveler, if only just to know the name and where from, at length became so numerous as hardly to attract a passing notice, unless in the immediate vicinity of our camping grounds. We had encamped upon one of the very smallest streams between the Little Blue and the Platte rivers; we were all joyous and happy, our animals as yet in excellent condition, our company all in good health, and we had not been enough upon the plains to know or feel fatigued. It was Saturday afternoon, and we had stopped early, where water and grass were abundant, and intended to remain there over Sunday.

"Tents were pitched, our horses quietly grazing, and gaily resounded throughout the camp. More than one of us had observed a little strip of board no wider than a man's hand, standing upright amid the green grass but a few rods from our wagons. One of our company thinking it would make good kindlings, went out to get it, but returned without it, saying nothing. Another went, and he too, returned without it, saying nothing. Another went, and he too, returned without it; and yet another; and as they returned, all seemed less joyous than before. Our own curiosity was excited, and we, too, with a companion went out to see it, and discover if possible its apparent sacredness. On approaching, we found ourselves approaching a lone little grave! The puny mound of earth was fresh, and the green grass around it had hardly recovered from its recent trampling; and newly cut, as with a pen knife, upon the frail monument were these words:

"OUR ONLY CHILD: DEAR LITTLE MARY: FOUR YEARS OLD."

"But we had no means of ascertaining whose Little Mary it was. As the sun was yet an hour high or more, it was proposed that we should go on a mile or two to other camping grounds, and without a question being asked, or a reason given, it was unanimously approved and carried into effect.—But the true and only cause was the nearness to our camping ground of that lone little grave, and its frail monument. Isn't this a touching incident? [Knickerbocker.]
