BEAUTIFUL VENICE.

A PANORAMA OF THE CITY OF THE WATERS.

The Canal and the Gondolas--Streets and Churches--Relics of Barbarism--The Famous Bronzes.

Correspondence Detroit Free Press.

When I left Venice four years ago, | When I left Venice four years ago, the spot at the top where Dogo it seemed not only that I was taking Merino Falieri was beheaded as a a final leave of the beautiful city of traitor in his eightieth year, and the waters, but that in a few years peeps at the hole in the wall where the eye of man would behold it no whose mouth you could, in the good more. Yet here it stands, as weath- old times, slip an anonymous charge er beaten, eracked, crumbling and against your enemy or rival, citing disintegrating, but as beautiful, him as a conspirator against the unique and enchanting as ever! republic, and he would probably mysteriously disappear and be seen They tell me that the piles on which no more. Between those two red the palaces are built have been in- columns on the balcony capital senspected recently under many of them tences were read to the crowd below, and found almost as hard and solid and mine host saw Silvio Pellico as stone. And good reason that placed there to listen to his; while, they should last, if one of them, va, breaking from the dreadful cells which was discovered to be standing of the "Piombi," made his wonderful upon twelve hundred piles of solid Serews ebony, may be taken as a specime n!

THE GRAND CANAL.

on the Grand Canal is as difficult a the Colden Book of Naples. And place to write a letter in as you can well imagine. The attention is continually attracted by the novel sights, although no sounds arrest the ear. For the stillness of the city always impresses the stranger most forcibly. Here, in its very heart, there is no rattling of wheels or clattering of hoofs, no shouts of peripatetic venders, no pattering of footfalls of racing children. A Sunday-like calm and stillness reigns continually. And the boats all move with such a noiseless, silent propulsion that, but for the gondolier's long drawn cry of warning as he rounds a corner, cautioning any approaching craft to avoid it collision, they might be Charen's beats ferry ing spirits across the Styr.

GONDOLAS.

Look at that swift gondola speeding from the railway station to the sat and weaved their meshes, and hotel, a rower in front and one in rear, standing on the light decks, and fittings remaining unchanged while, within, a party of tourists are reclining luxuriously, with their days of powerful tyranny. And then gazing with wonder on the strange hand, conducts you through a labyboat with its long cabin and half of some aristocratic family, all in fu- ment of the palace, through which bright varnish, shining over the hearts, from the presence of the paint, and polished brasses, laced judges to imprisonment or execution; curtains, crimson cushions, or a tiny lamp burning before the little shrine middle of the in a fanciful aquatic livery.

And alas! there goes dashing With "a palace and prison on either past, a steam launch from the Navy hand." and are shown the place Yard, and another from the English puffing tug with her convoy of barges, looking as out of place here as the railway does in Pompoii, break-ing the stillness of the air, and dashing swells against the gondolas and awakening feelings of unutterable wrath in the bosoms of the gon-doliers and of all conservative and right-thinking Venetians. I wish founder, or get themselves otherwise out of the way !

THE STREETS OF VENICE.

Venice has some handsome business streets, smoothly paved and kept perfectly clean, being all sidewalk, where there is no horse or vehicle to molest or frighten you, but you can zig zag at will from the shops or one side to those on the other. These streets pass over the canals by bridges the full width of the street, and you can only tell that you are presented. that you are passing over by the flights of steps on either side. The "Merceria," the principal street of the fancy shops runs from the Square of San Marco to the Rialto, which is a single marble arch of steep ascent, resting on twelve thousand piles, with a row of shops on either side of the central passage and a curving footpath along either margin, while succeeding flights of steps ascend the middle to a central crown, over which a busy crowd passes continually, for it is still, as in Shakespeare's time, one of the most thronged places in Venice.

THE DOGE'S PLACE.

The Doge's palace is built in a style of architecture which is all its own and which makes it stand out distinctly in the memory, apart from all the great buildings of the world. One wanders through its beautiful court, with its two wells of richly embossed bronze in the centre, at which laughing girls are gossiping and drawing water in copper buckets, and studies its facades, inlaid with blocks of marble of various colors, like a great checker-board, and its windows, filled with the little round panes set in metal, a peculiarity of old Venice, and climbs the giant's stairs, pausing awhile to note over the leaden roof above, Casanoescape into the canals and thence to France, which rang through all Europe. Then climb up the beautiful Scala d'Ora, or golden steps, which formerly no one could ascend A Venetian chamber looking out unless his family were registered in you stroll, guide-book in hand, through the beautiful library and you ' countil chambers, their walls hung with enormous pictures (one, Tintoretto's Paradise, the largest in the the world) principally of sea fights, triumphs and treaties of the proud days when Venetian Doges were the equals of kings, her fleets the largest and best in the world, and when she kept astute embassadors at every European Court, who made constant reports of the condition of the country to which they were accredited, which reports are now furnishing to the historians of those countries their most fruitful and instructive guides. And you are shown

THE COUNCIL CHAMBERS

Of "the Ten" and "the Three." The very hearts of the far reaching webs in which these cunning old spiders since those gloomy and myterious you follow a guide who, torch in sights. Then comes an omnibus rinth of narrow stairs and winding dozen rowers. Next, a private boat the wall and part under the baseneral black like the others, but with the accused were led, with sinking hand," and are shown the place where the captives made confession yacht, and behind them a laboring, through the double grating of their dungeons to the priest outside, and the smoke-blackened dungeon niche in the wall where the crucifix stands with the light before it (the last consoling spot on which his eyes should rest on earth,) and then the spot close at hand in the narrow dark passage, where he was strangled by torch-light, and the hole in the wall they would all blow up, collide, through which his corpse was thrust into a vaiting gondola and hurried away to be ridden beneath the waters. And then you stoop and crouch to get into the little

GLOOMY DUNGEONS,

In utter pitchy darkness, with a hole in the door from the black passage without, through which the prisoners' food was passed, and no other opening, and a stone slab' for bed pillow, and no other furniture; in which men delicately nurtured, ancient statesmen, famous generals, were thrust and kept in solitude and the blackness of midnight, with but vermin and rats for company, until death or madness came to their relief. In a row of the worst of them, half under water, no longer than pantries at home, excluded from every ray of light, doges, admirals, embassadors, common people whose sufferings were as keen as theirs, whose wives and children pined for them as 'hopelessly,' have languished till they died.' The walls of some of the cells are covered with most pitiful, despairing inscriptions, traced in the darkness, 'laboriously, letter by letter miscen when completed, full of admissions that escape or relief was impossible, and yet all breathing of that hope "Which dwells eternal in the human breast."
