THE RUSSIANS IN CAMP.

—O—
A PICTURE OF SCENES ON THE BEAUTIFUL BLUE DANUBE.

Motley Groups--A Confederate Camp--Cossacks at Large--A Queer Baggage Train--The Reporters Preparing for War.
Bucharest Cor. Philadelphia Times.

A camp of Russians is as motley and picturesque an assembly of men and beasts as was ever seen. Any American who had experience in the rebellion would say at once that the Russians look like Confederate soldiers, and no more descriptive parallel could be presented to the American public than to compare in general appearance a camp on the Dinboritza to a Confederate camp on the Rappahannock during the rebellion. The infantry bivouac about their stacked arms, spreading the contents of their knapsacks on the ground and hanging their garments on the bayonets to dry and air. Great coats of coarse gray stuff propped up on two or three sticks serve as a tent for two soldiers, who make their bed of a second coat and cook their coffee over a little fire of twigs before their rude tent. Their loose uniforms of white cotton become earth colored after a march, and look shabby and unmilitary, and a battalion falling in for rations has anything but a soldierly appearance. Examine the dark faces, doubly dark in contrast with the light color of the uniforms, and you will find that there is an unmistakable intelligence in the rank and file, that they are slow to think and act and have not a superabundance of energy, but have good powers of endurance and are accustomed to obey. They have not the individuality of the soldiers of some of the other great military nations, nor the self-assertion of the American, but their general appearance is not unattractive. The officers are, as a class, fine-looking, intelligent men, without much fire in their composition, but with a certain dignity of carriage that proves a habit of commanding. They have sympathetic dispositions, as a rule, and make friends wherever they go. The majority of them, of course, speak nothing but Russian, but often one may hear among them pure English, French, or German spoken, with the fluency of a native.

THE COSSACKS.

The Cossacks tie their horses to a double line of ropes, and appear to bivouac by the sides of the animals, so compact is the arrangement of their camp, and the field artillery park their guns with great care at the end of each day's march. The Cossack is a conundrum. He is sometimes mounted on a scrawny beast of a horse, and sometimes is seen on a showy animal that has more saddle than his rider. Perched up on a saddle that is made of a wooden tree, with a great cushion on top that may be removed at will, and a pommel at least eight inches high, it is sometimes difficult to tell the rough-looking fellow from a native farm hand. He always seems, however, to be going somewhere, both his horse and himself having a business air about them, and a complete disregard of anybody or anything. A Cossack will sleep in the middle of the road or across the sidewalk with as much freedom as in his own tent—if he ever had a tent. He sleeps anywhere and at any time, and seems to like it. There is a corps of six hundred of these fellows, it is said, who are selected as scouts because they are uncommonly quick to see and hear. Their activity in other respects no one can doubt. A battalion of Cossacks has no frills about it—to indulge in slang a little; it is all for service and has all seen service; Dust-colored uniforms, wiry horses, bright, active men, there does not seem to be an ounce of superfluous baggage or an extra button. It is a gypsy-looking crowd, but it does one good to see them scamper past.

THE COMMISSARY.

Next to these the most original thing is the supply train. It is composed of various kinds of wagons, all much after the same pattern as regards the heavy wheels and frame, but varying from a wicker body to a box or to a tray like a half hoghead. Few of the wagons are much larger than a half hoghead, either, and none of them heavier than a small express wagon. They have no springs and no cover, except a loose tarpaulin or a bundle of old canvas. These small, bony beasts, which would be called ponies anywhere else, trot along with the carts as nimbly as cats, while a few bags of grain, with a driver asleep on the top, is perhaps the only load. Of course it takes four times the number of wagons to make a Russian supply train that it does to make an American train carrying the same weight. But the active little ponies are as enduring as mules, and a train moves with great rapidity. It looks, however, like a caravan of gypsies, and, when at camp, like a bivouac of the same wanderers, for the drivers sleep anywhere they find the softest bed, picket their horses without any order and use the great wooden bow, that spans the neck of the middle horse, for a crane over the camp-fire.

THE ARMY IN QUARTERS.

The Russian officers in general are stout, good-natured fellows, with practical and common sense notions no doubt, but have little energy in their composition. They have brought along enough baggage for a bridal tour, and are allowed a number of attendants that will increase the corps of non-combatants in the army to an astonishing size. The hotels are full of them, all in white linen coats and caps, tight trousers and top boots. An occasional Circassian, with rows of silver cartridge cases on each breast, a belt full of pistols and knives, a long sword with straight handle and a pair of tall boots half hidden by the skirts of his long coat, strolls about in a dignified way. How he will endure the great heat with his heavy fur cap no one can tell. In fact, it is sure that the heat will be one of the greatest enemies the invaders will have to fight. It is now over eighty in the shade and growing hotter every day. The valley of the low Danube, with the great meadows and stagnant pools, is as dangerous to the foreigner as the campaign of Rome, and the heavy-limbed Russians, with their temperament and constitution, are little fitted for the long marches in the scorching sun of the plains. It must be said in their favor that they are a remarkably intelligent looking body of men, so far as I have seen them. The sanitary corps seems to be well organized and very large. The red crosses abound at every camp and the doctors circulate in great numbers on the railways.

THE ARMY OF REPORTERS.

The most serious preparations that are visible here now are those of the correspondents, notable those of the London Times and London News, who have finely fitted up field wagons with all the paraphernalia for a long journey, with servants, couriers, draught and saddle horses. Of course only those correspondents who are received at headquarters make any preparations to accompany the army. And it is not an easy matter to get recognized as a correspondent. First, there must be a certificate from the Russian Minister from the capital of the country whence you come. Then this must be approved by the director of the correspondents, an official appointed for this purpose, and lastly, when all is in order, you must present two photographs to the authorities and also one to be endorsed and stamped by them. This last is to be carried on the person as a sure means of identification, and when the photograph is returned, stamped and endorsed, to the correspondent, he receives as well as a brass oval plate, about eight inches long, marked with the word "correspondent" in Russian, a number and a red seal, to be worn on the left arm. Once the badge is received the correspondent is allowed to circulate anywhere he chooses. He is, however, said to be held personally responsible for whatever he sends. It is generally considered that this is the most reasonable recognition of the rights of newspaper correspondents that could be devised.

Harvard students have an exceedingly ponderous sense of humor. Their latest joke was to throw a mattress from a dormitory window down upon a throng of people. It struck a woman on the head and forced a comb into her skull, but then the Harvard innocents must have their little enjoyments even if it is at the slight inconvenience of others.
