DOLCE DOMUM.

The following beautiful lines, which breathe the fire of true poetry, were written by a young student of Eton School, England, who having been confined to the College during the vacation for some fault he had committed, pined away, and died of sorrow at not being permitted to enjoy the holidays with his friends at his beloved home. It is customary at Eton College for the whole establishment to assemble on the top of St. Catherine's Hill the day before the summer vacation, when these lines, composed by the unfortunate youth, are sung by the choristers of the chapel, accompanied by a band of music, and the whole company join in the chorus.

Sing a sweet melodious measure,
Waft enchanting lays around;
Home, a theme replete with pleasure,
Home, a grateful theme resound!

CHORUS.

Home! sweet home! I an ample treasure!
Home! with every blessing crown'd!
Home! perpetual source of pleasure!
Home! a noble strain resound!

Lo! the joyful hour advances,
Happy season of delight!
Festal songs, and festal dances,
All our tedious toils requite.

Home, sweet home, &c.

Leave, my wearied muse, thy learning;
Leave thy task so hard to bear;
Leave thy labor, cease returning;
Leave, my bosom, O! thy care.

Home, sweet home, &c.

See the year, the meadows smiling!
Let us then a smile display;
Rural sports our pain beguiling,
Rural pastimes call away.

Home, sweet home, &c.

Now the swallow seeks her dwelling,
And no longer loves to roam;
Her example thus impelling,
Let us seek our native home.

Home, sweet home, &c.

Let our men and steeds assemble,
Panting for the wide campaign;
Let the ground beneath us tremble,
While we scour along the plain.

Home, sweet home, &c.

Oh! what raptures! oh! what blisses,
When we gain the lovely gate!
Mother's arms and sisters' kisses,
There our blest arrival wait.

Home, sweet home, &c.

Greet our household gods with singing;
Lend, O Lucifer, thy ray;
Why should light so slowly springing,
All our promised joys delay?

Home, sweet home, &c.

CRAFT AND CRIME IN IRELAND.

The following singular statement was made to the narrator when in Ireland, not long since, by one upon whose authority he can place the utmost reliance. He does not pretend to account for it. The circumstances are however, so far as related, strictly true.

Some three or four years ago, the reader may recollect seeing in the papers an account of the assassination in noontime of a Mr. C., a magistrate of Clare, and a man of large fortune. It was in summer that Mr. C. was returning on the outside jaunting-car from the sessions, at a place called Tulla, and was within about two miles of the town of Ennis, when a man raised himself over the wall of a gentleman's demesne, and fired with a double-barrelled gun on Mr. C. as he drove by, wounding him in the arm. Mr. C. turned round, recognised the man, who, to make sure, levelled the gun again, and fired at him a second time, mortally wounding him in the body. The driver pulled the horse up, and Mr. C. alighting, went into the house and informed the owner that he was shot, and that a man named Molony, a tenant of his (Mr. C's) had shot him. The police and magistrates, with surgeons, were soon on the spot. The medical men pronounced the case hopeless. Mr. C. knew it was so, and met his fate with singular fortitude. So quickly, however, did the authorities act, that in a few hours after the event, and before Mr. C. died, the police entered the parlor, on the sofa of which he was lying, having in their custody the alleged assassin. The wounded gentleman raised himself by an effort, and deliberately and distinctly identified him.

"That is the man," said he. "It was you, Molony, who shot me."
"God forgive you, Mr. C.," said the man firmly. "This is not the first time you have tried to injure me. It was not I who shot you."
"On the word and faith of a dying man, it was," emphatically repeated Mr. C.

His depositions were therefore taken, and Molony was committed for trial. The clearness of the identification seemed to require no corroboration, but there were circumstances that further confirmed it. Molony believed himself hardly treated by Mr. C. in some matter of land, and had been heard to threaten vengeance. He was known to be a resolute fellow, of little truth, and Mr. C. was not remarkable for much indulgence. The case then seemed clear, and when it was tried at the assizes, the evidence for the prosecution and the declaration of the dying man appeared to make a conviction inevitable; when the prisoner's counsel called witnesses to prove an alibi. Of all the most hackneyed modes of evading justice employed by the Irish criminal the alibi is the most frequently resorted to, the parties called to prove it being usually their own friends. In this instance, however, the court was startled by hearing the names of two of the most respectable magistrates of the county called.

Mr. M. ascended the table and took his seat on the chair, which, in the Irish courts, is usually placed for the witnesses in this conspicuous place.

"Mr. M.," asked the prisoner's counsel, "do you know the prisoner at the bar?"

"Yes—well."

"Do you recollect seeing him on the first day of the sessions of —?" "This was the day on which Mr. C. was shot."

"Yes; he came to me at T. —, [T. — was eight miles from the place where the assassination occurred,] and spoke to me."

"At what time was that?"

"At half-past one." [This was as nearly as possible the hour when the fatal shots were fired.]

"How do you know it was that hour?"

"He asked me what o'clock it was. I told him. He appeared to forget, returned in about a minute, touched his hat, and asked me again, and I again took out my watch and told him."

"Do you know the prisoner's brother?"

"Yes."

"You could not have mistaken his brother for him?"

"No. I am quite clear on that point. I could not be mistaken, for I spoke to the prisoner about the fair."

The counsel for the crown asked some questions, but the witness's certainty on the point could not be shaken. Mr. M. — was a clear-headed, clever man; a magistrate of high respectability, and could not have any object in sheltering the prisoner.

Mr. B., another magistrate, was next called. His account was nearly the same as that of his brother magistrate. A few minutes, it must have been, after the prisoner accosted Mr. M., he spoke to him, (Mr. B.) and asked him what o'clock it was, repeating the question, and making some observations on the fair.

The result was, the alibi was completely proved, and in the face of the solemn dying declaration of Mr. C. —, the prisoner was acquitted. He left the dock for free, when every one believed he would only have left it for the gallows.

Soon after Molony's brother left the country, but Molony himself remained. The mystery, however, so far as men's minds were concerned, was soon unravelled, though the circumstances upon which the solution was founded were not sufficiently strong to constitute evidence. The prisoner did not fire the shot, and was at the fair of T. — when the assassination took place.

There is little or no reason to doubt that he got his brother to commit the deed, as he knew from circumstances that he himself would be suspected. His brother resembled him, and to make the resemblance the greater, they changed clothes, the assassin wearing the ordinary garments of the other, those with the appearance of which Mr. C. must have been somewhat familiar. In the meantime, while he took these pains to deceive Mr. C. —, or whomsoever might be with Mr. C. —, as to the identity of the assassin, Molony secured his own safety by a very marked alibi taking care that his witnesses should be of that class and character who could not be suspected of collusion. In fact, an act once more subtle and sanguinary could not be committed. It was devised with the most deadly hate and circumstantial coolness. The authorities were morally convinced of this being the case, yet they could not, with the dying declaration of the murdered man as to the identity of the prisoner, who was acquitted, take any effectual steps to vindicate justice.

But Heaven's justice vindicated itself in an awful way. The actual assassin quitted the country, but his instigator and brother remained, blood-marked, however, in the belief of most people. He, however, appeared to be in no way oppressed with secret consciousness of his guilt. He went about his business as usual; and so matters went on until the fair of T. — came round once more—the anniversary of that when Mr. C. — was shot. Molony attended this as others, but did not return to his house until the night was very far advanced, and then in such an awful state that his family were terrified at his appearance. His face was livid and swollen, and he seemed in a raging fever. In answer to their first questions he declared, with hideous fright in every feature, that he had been met by Mr. C. —, (the murdered man), when returning home, drawn to the spot by the road where the trees were thickest, and there beaten by the angry spirit until he was all but insensible. He was placed in his bed in a high state of fever, his body swelled, and he continued delirious, raving about Mr. C's ghost, until death freed him from further suffering. Cool men attributed the phenomenon to fever acting on a guilty mind, and possibly that he might have been beaten while in liquor by some one on his way home, and that his own fears alone invested the assailant with the form of the man whose death he had compassed.— I suppose these conjectures are correct—at least they are reasonable. Others shook their heads, however, and said Heaven had a way, when human laws failed, of vindicating eternal justice. The matter, however, was never investigated. I have my narrative from a party in the neighborhood, who knew the facts to be as I have stated, and he related them to me.— Bristol Times.
