

From the Anderson Gazette.

NINA MELVILLE.

And is not love in vain
Torture enough, without a living tomb!
[BYRON.]

Now nevermore, oh! never in the world
Of its pure cause, let sorrowing love on earth,
Trust fondly—never more!—the hope is crushed
That fit my life, the voice within me hushed
That spoke sweet oracles; and I return
To lay my youth, as in a burial urn,
Where sunshine may not find it.

[Mrs. Hemans.]

It was a gloomy evening in the month of October. All day the rain had descended in torrents, and the heavy clouds wore a dull leaden appearance. Alone in her elegantly furnished parlor sat the proud, the gifted, but unhappy Mrs. Melville. Carelessly fell the bright golden curls around her pale fair brow. The costly robe and splendid jewels that she wore, seemed in strange contrast with her livid face, and the desponding attitude of her slight form. Aye, that child of beauty—that star of passion, was alone, and—miserable. All that wealth and luxury and pride could give, could not bring peace to the troubled spirit. She was alone—and thought was busy among the winding labyrinths of the dreary past; and ever and anon, a ghastly and half-forgotten shadow from theasket of memory, would rise in ideal presence before her, making her start and shudder with dread.

Long had she followed in gay Pleasure's laughing train; but she had in sorrow learned that revelry and real happiness are strangers. She had whirled in the giddy dance—she had echoed the festive song, and joined in the gay sallies of wit—'twas lethe that she sought—these could give it not, nor still the workings of wild melancholy thought;—

Beware of thoughts. They whisper to the heavens.
The route to thee, they prompt the diamond pen.
Of the recording angel.

Nina was the only daughter of once wealthy parents; and though repeated losses had very much reduced their worldly fortune, they still lived in elegance and splendor, and moved in the highest circles of society. In early youth she was wooed by, and without the knowledge of her proud parents, betrothed to, a young man—the playmate of her infancy, and the realization of her girlhood's most romantic dreams.—Happy were the hours that the gentle and affectionate Henry Lindsay spent with his adored Nina. Always at the pensive hours of evening, with her soft hand clasped in his, he wandered by the purling stream, or rested beneath the shade of the stately trees that adorned her father's lawn. It was during such hours as these, when his large dark eyes were lit with the holy light of love, that his face seemed to Nina, radiant as an angel's with beauty. It was during such hours as these, that in tones more soft and musical than the murmur of falling waters, he poured the wild poetry of his soul into her listening ear—binding her as with a spell—a spell that would not break.

But those blissful meetings, like all else that we enjoy, were of short duration. For soon the suspicions of Nina's worldly-minded parents were aroused. Henry Lindsay possessed not the magic charm of gold; and for the lack of a few paltry dollars, the bright hopes and sweet dreams of those fond young hearts, were blighted forever. Nina was sent to a boarding school, to complete her education; and Henry was driven with taunts and threats, from her father's house, and forbidden ever again to cross its threshold.

Darkly fell the shadow of grief upon the soul of the poet lover. Sensitive and shrinking in his nature, he was almost crushed by the cruel treatment he received; but not until he heard his doom from Nina's own lips, did the siren Hope, entirely desert him. 'Twas then a deep sense of wrong, and a dreary feeling of loneliness, settled down like death upon his soul. He felt himself alone—in the vast world, a wanderer, and—alone!

Years glided away, and Nina returned to her parental roof, a beautiful and accomplished lady. And though she was far from having forgotten her first love, she either remembered it with less anguish, or had learned to conceal under a gay and careless exterior, the pangs of a wounded heart.

Years passed away, and she was married to Mr. Melville, literally a husband of her father's choice, and in the phrase of the world, a "monied man"—one far her superior in age, who had spent the heyday of life in heaping up the fleeting treasures of earth, and crushing all the tender and elevated emotions of his soul—one with whom she could have no sympathy of taste or feeling.

Brightly shone the lamps that lit the gorgeous halls of her father's stately mansion, on the night that Nina's strange nuptials were celebrated. Little knew the gay and careless ones, that gathered around her, of the weight of bitter woe her young heart was hiding in mocking smiles.

The day on which we introduced Nina to the reader, was the sixth anniversary of her marriage. Mr. Melville had a yet returned from the counting-room, where most of his time was spent, for though he had amassed almost boundless wealth, he still attended as closely to his business as when he first began a merchant's life. Nina was, as we have said, alone, and busy with mournful memories of the past. How sadly on her ear fell the low wail of the chiding blast, and the pattering of the rain-drops upon the window. Many a dark thought, and unavailing regret, stirred the troubled waters of her soul. A strange feeling of awe—a pre-sentiment of coming evil, crept over her, as she sat gazing on the dismal sky, and listening to the moaning wind. But softly, softly another sound stole upon her ear, making her start with clasped hands, and an expression of horror on her face. It was a groan! Again it rose even fainter than before. With hurried steps she sought the spot from whence it seemed to issue. Under the thickly inwoven shrubbery beneath the window, she found the almost lifeless form of a human being, and had him carried into the house, and suitable restoratives applied to revive the flickering lamp of life. Gently did the stricken and sorrowing girl smooth the pillow of the desolate stranger. Slowly he opened his eyes—those large, expressive eyes, that had so long haunted her dreams. Gently his pale quivering lips moved—they yielded the one word "Nina!" and she with a shriek recognized in the wasted and dying one before her, the once beautiful and beloved Henry Lindsay! He was aroused to life but to breathe it out, upon her bosom, leaving her even more wretched than before. Wildly her lips were pressed to his, and her white arms twined around him. Then came the story of his suffering and sorrow, through the long years of his banishment from her beloved presence; of his vain struggle with the cold and heartless world—and lastly, when disease had laid its venomous finger upon his mortal frame, and he was fast sinking into the arms of death, how he had come to look once more on her dear face—to look, if but to die.

All this time, wrapped as in a trance, Nina had forgotten all save the presence of her Henry, and sought alone to alleviate his pain. She saw that the sand of life was fast ebbing to a close. Alas! alas! she could have borne aught else save this. Colder, colder grew his brow; and his large eyes were fast losing their wonted brilliancy. She felt that he was dying. Oh! what an expression of anguish passed over her face! With contracted brows and compressed lips she turned and hastily left the room—not a moment was to be lost. Forgotten was the proud world, its scornful sneer was nothing to her now. The only being whom she really loved—he whose image had been ever present with her, was dying. Their souls were mingled in one long fond gaze—they had met and would not be parted. In a few minutes she returned, bringing in her hand, a small vial containing poison. Kneeling beside his prostrate form, with desperate resolution she drank the fatal draught—she was a suicide!

There, clasped in each others' embraces, were found—with the cold impress of death upon their wan features, these victims to a sordid love of gold; and 'twas a strange theme for busy-tongued slander.

The corpse of the lonely stranger was interred in an obscure corner of the public burying ground, with naught to mark his resting place, save a small mound of turf. Nina they laid beneath a pompous monument, erected by her husband's pride, and inscribed with a glowing epitaph.

Alas, for the withered hopes! Alas, for the broken hearts! With which this one degraded passion, avarice, has made our beautiful world teem! How often does the heartless and unfeeling parent, believing he has tasted all the pleasures of earth, and found them to flow, learn to think, that gold alone can purchase happiness, and his fair daughter is brought in all the sweet bloom of youth, and her thrilling heart laid a bleeding sacrifice upon the cold altar of this God of Thousands.
