News From 'Home'

In New York the Ranee of Sarawak is shown listening to radioed war bulletins for further word regarding the Japanese invasion of the island where her husband, Sir Charles Brooke, is the white ruler over half a million natives. On the island of Borneo, all wells were destroyed by the British before retreating.

JUNK—Needed

It is quite possible that this war may be won by the junkmen who collect old papers, rags, tin cans, broken tools and thread-bare tires.

This is a war that calls for more tons of materials of all kinds than all of the past wars put together. No matter how brave or daring our soldiers and sailors are, no matter what master plans may be formulated by our generals for crushing our enemy, the final outcome will depend upon what group of nations can produce fastest and what group has the most materials available for production.

In the back yards, cellars and scrap-baskets of America are enough materials to win major engagements on the battlefield.

When you consider that steel mills rely upon the return of scrap metal for about one-third of their raw materials, you can begin to realize the part which the junkman plays in this war.

Steel is just one of many war industries which need our waste materials. Paper, rags and rubber are almost as important as steel in our war program.

That's why the government has organized a bureau of industrial conservation which is primarily concerned with seeing to it that nothing is thrown away which could be shot at Hitler.

Every one of us should think of our scrap-baskets, our junk piles and our attics full of trash as mines of ammunition—raw material which can be magically turned into bullets, tanks, planes and ships.

We can give this material to the junkman. Or we can give it to the Salvation Army or any charitable organization which collects waste material. Or, if we wish, we can sell some of it to junk dealers.

There are only two don'ts:

1. Don't burn or destroy anything without first making sure it isn't of some use. And there is practically nothing which cannot be utilized.

2. Don't give your waste material to any junkman without first asking him what he does with it. Make sure that he doesn't destroy it, burn it or throw it on dumps. There are still plenty of collectors who haven't yet learned of the need for this material. You can help teach them.

SACRIFICE—Initiative

One of the greatest problems of organizing America as an efficient war machine is that of overcoming our general attitude of waiting for orders.

Most of us know we are going to have to make all kinds of sacrifices. We want to help. We want to know what we can do. We say we'll do anything "when we are asked."

But what many of us can't get into our heads is the fact that we may not be asked—that we must figure out for ourselves what we can do. Mr. Roosevelt and his many assistants are working day and night to formulate A, B, C plans of just what the people can do—but that doesn't mean we should wait until the plans are laid on our doorstep.

We must, each of us, do things of our own accord. We must work up plans of our own—plans for what our families and our towns can do right now toward winning the war. We must take action into our own hands, work under our own steam—and do just as good a job in our little piece of America as the president is trying to do for the whole country.

OPPORTUNITY—Delay

The "Salvage for Victory" campaign offers us one of many opportunities for immediate action.

We could wait for Washington to work out a plan, wait for that plan to be organized on a state basis, wait for the state gradually to formulate a local plan which would finally filter down to our town and our household. But meanwhile valuable material would be lost forever.

Besides, that's not the way a democracy works. All Washington should have to say is: "We need your waste paper, rags, rubber, etc." From there on we should take the initiative. We should organize committees, talk to local officials, study the avenues by which waste material gets to defense industry—and deliver the goods.

But because we don't do enough on our own accord, the government finds it necessary to spend the time of valuable executives working up plans for us—plans such as the suggestion of Leon Henderson that a child in each family be designated as a member of the salvage army to collect and save all waste material in his home.

Mr. Henderson's idea is a good one. But it shouldn't be necessary for him to create such detailed, localized plans for directing us in fulfilling a government need. It's our job as Americans to take part of the responsibility for winning this war into our own hands.

THE sun shone bright through the half-frosted windows of the Perkins' hotel room. On his chair in the corner Ralph squirmed uneasily and avoided looking at Sheila.

Sheila and Ralph were troupers. On the stage they were billed as Seabee and Perkins, but in private life they were Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Perkins.

Sheila watched her husband thoughtfully for a few moments. Then she edged over and planted herself on his disengaged knee. "I don't know whether to laugh or cry," she whispered running her fingers through his curly locks. "Friday we start. Ten solid weeks of straight booking. How much money have we, dear?"

Ralph removed Sheila from his knee and stood up. "Thirty-three dollars," he announced solemnly after a careful inventory of his pockets. "And thirty of that goes for the hotel bill when we check out Friday."

"I can't ask for an advance until we've played at least one performance. That leaves us three dollars to live on for three days."

"The check," Ralph said casually. "I'll pay it now."

Before Ralph could question her or ask what she was going to do, she had popped one of the dollars into her purse and disappeared into the hall.

In a half hour she was back laden with supplies. "There," she said exultantly. "Liver sausage, bread, butter and pie. Enough for lunch and dinner."

Ralph stared and then suddenly began to laugh hysterically.

His wife was indignant. "What's the joke?" she demanded tartly.

Ralph finally got his breath and gave her a hug. "Darling, I couldn't help it. I was just laughing at the irony of the thing. How are we going to eat all this stuff? We haven't a knife, a fork, a spoon, a plate or a tablecloth. As a matter of fact, we haven't even a table."

Sheila gave one weak little moan and threw herself on the bed. Ralph watched her stupidly for a moment and then suddenly his face began to light up slowly like a beacon. "I've got it," he roared. "Sheila, how much did you spend for all this?"

His wife looked bewildered through her tears. "Seventy cents," she faltered.

"Fine," Ralph beamed. "Coffee is fifteen cents in the dining room downstairs. No matter what you order they send up a table with all the trimmings. We'll just ring up room service, order two cups and for thirty cents we can have our feast."

Sheila caught on right away. Carefully she concealed the food under the bed and Ralph phoned down for room service.

In a few minutes the waiter appeared and laid the cloth. When he had finished he presented the menu.

"Just two cups of coffee." Ralph gave the order carelessly.

The man nodded mechanically and disappeared into the hall. In a short while he was back with a fragrant, steaming pot of coffee. He poured it into the two cups and retired.

Ralph and Sheila held their breath until his footsteps faded away down the hall, then they locked the door and dove under the bed after their supplies.

Finally, when they had disposed of all the pie and sandwiches they could hold and after they had carefully boxed the remainder to keep until supper time. Ralph phoned for the waiter.

He knocked softly at the door, entered and began to stack up the plates and remove the table.

"The check," Ralph said casually. "I'll pay it now."

"The check?" The waiter looked bewildered.

"Yes, the check," said Ralph nervously. "Didn't you bring it?"

"Why, there are no checks today," said the waiter. "This is New Year's day. Everything is on the house. And do you know," he added in a sudden burst of confidence, "you're the only people in the hotel that didn't order the whole menu." He shouldered the portable table and started down the hall. "Happy New Year," he called.

Sheila and Ralph stood huddled together in the doorway. "Happy New Year," they murmured faintly.

Masonic Officers Elected

Magnolia Masonic lodge has elected the following officers for the coming year:

Worshipful Master—Cecil Blakely.
Deputy Master—J. T. Fulmer.
Senior Warden—D. J. Buchanan.
Junior Warden—J. J. Clark.
Treasurer—Ray Surratt.
Secretary—J. M. Fulmer.
Senior Deacon—J. L. Abrams.
Junior Deacon—W. O. Stewart.
Senior Steward—Jess Thomas.
Junior Steward—C. E. Chapman.
Tiler—Frank Phillips.

Beginning January 6, the lodge will hold its regular monthly meetings on Monday instead of Friday.

Out-Door Decorations

About 50 houses had porch and window decorations this year, and the judges report that all those displayed were tastefully done.

Mrs. Bruce Galloway received first prize for a lovely porch manger so well lighted that every detail was visible from the judges' car. To Woodrow Sullivan, who had arranged a most unusual offering with every detail worked out to perfection in arrangement and lighting, went second prize. The doorway of Mrs. J. J. Clark was exquisite with simplicity, an arrangement of candles, wreaths and good lighting. The Hollingsworth, Byars, Hunnicutt, Rowlands, Colemans, Dickey and Roy O'Dell doors were especially commended.

The windows were all attractive and the judges report they were in a dilemma until they found the J. E. Boyce window, which was an arrangement of the little town of Bethlehem with tiny lighted homes and the inn with the manger in the distance. To them went the prize for the most unusual window. The E. J. Willingham children arranged a delightful window for which they received honorable mention.

The R. G. Carrs provided a timely note on the theme "Buy Defense Bonds"—with soldiers in the foreground.

Goldville Civilian Defense Organized

Twenty-two residents of Goldville met at the club house Monday evening and organized a civilian defense committee.

County Chairman C. F. Fleming met with the group and expressed the hope that there will never come a time when the property and life of Goldville must be safeguarded. That our community should be prepared was agreed and the following committee chairmen were appointed:

General chairman — D. J. Buchanan.
Planning division — W. A. Moorhead.
Necessities division—Dr. R. H. McGee.
Utilities division—W. E. Bragg.
Communications division — J. D. Butler.

Chairman Buchanan announces that a registration bureau will be found in the director's office at Joanna club, where cards will be furnished and where one may sign up for whatever line of service appeals to him. He urges everyone in the village 18 years or over sign a card at once. The registry will be open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day but Wednesday.
