NATIONAL DESIRES ARE CONTROLLING IN ITALY

Rome, Dec. 13.—Premier Salandra made a speech at Turin the other day in which he said two words east summed up Italy's purposes in the present European conflict—"National aspirations." These two words are worth remembering by anyone who wishes to understand Italy's role in the present conflict, and how it differs from that of England, France, Russia and the other parties to the great struggle.

Premier Salandra spoke at the moment the Balkan situation was absorbing the attention of the world, but he did not mention the Balkans. If Serbia or Belgium or Poland had been uppermost in the public mind he doubtless would have passed that too without mention, for the key-note of Salandra and Italy in this war is not Belgium or Serbia or the Balkans or any other altruistic purpose, but always and distinctly the fulfillment of Italy's "national aspirations."

This policy of seizing the present moment, when all Europe is at war, for realizing Italy's aspirations, has swept aside old parties and leaders and brought new ones on the stage. It has given a name to a new party, the nationalist, which is an extreme section of this policy of realizing Italy's national aspirations, and it has founded a newspaper in Rome, the idea Nazionale, whose name again proclaims this fundamental idea of Italian policy, the realization of national aspirations.

When von Buelow retired from the German chancellorship, he chose Rome as his future home, his wife being an Italian woman, Princess di Gamporeale, and together they chose this palace of the roses. It was as a young attache of embassy here that von Buelow met his Italian bride, and Bismarck yielded for the first time to a request that a member of the German diplomatic corps marry a foreigner—a precedent which later gave American wives to Baron Speck von Sternberg, Baron von Kietter and many others.

Want Lost Provinces. First and foremost of these aspirations is to get back Italy's two lost provinces in the north—Trent in the west, and the rich strategic country north of Venice, sweeping around the head of the Adriatic down to Trieste. These two provinces are the Alsace and Lorraine of Italy. They are essentially Italian; all the people speak Italian; the Italian laws make them Italian citizens if they come to Italy; one of the members of the Italian cabinet is from these lost provinces and yet is an Italian citizen and a cabinet adviser of the king.

But Italy's national aspirations do not end with getting back her lost provinces. Just across the Adriatic lies Istria, that great stretch of country which used to be a Roman province and later was part of the Venetian republic. Italy does not forget that this valuable shoreland along the eastern Adriatic was once Italian, and national aspiration feels that it should again be Italian. And beyond that lie the Aegean islands, and the route to the east, with Italy as the great power lying nearest this dazzling field, and the great power having the largest coast line on the Mediterranean.

The Grandeur that Was Rome. In this, too, Italy does not forget that old Rome was mistress of the east and west, and that a Roman emperor, Constantine, founded Constantinople, and gave it his name. These aspirations are vaguely defined, and are not a distinct part of the present national aspiration movement, but they all go together in the popular hopes and dreams of an expanding and greater Italy.

The most notable feature of this new movement of national aspiration is the sudden disappearance of German prestige and influence. For years Germany had been building up a commanding position in the commercial, financial and industrial affairs of Italy. The Triple Alliance was the political bond, but German business men were doing more than the politicians. Practically the entire import of foreign goods, except coal, was controlled by Germany.

But this vast fabric of German influence in Italy was swept away almost in a day by the new movement for the realization of Italy's national aspirations. Up to that time, just before Italy entered the war, Giolitti had been the great power in Italian affairs, believed by many to be the greatest since Cavour. He had more than 300 of his partisans in the chamber and his word was law. Early last May he came to Rome determined to keep Italy out of the war, and with the chamber full of his partisans about to meet it was supposed Giolitti would prevail. But the force of the new movement for national aspirations was under-estimated. It was led by skillful new leaders, with their own newspapers. The popular imagination was excited by appeals to get back the lost provinces and for a greater Italy.

Downfall of Giolitti. Wild enthusiasm suddenly took possession of the people. Mobs formed in the streets, Giolitti's house was stormed. His supporters in the chamber were hooted and insulted. It was even feared that a revolution might spring out of the intense popular feeling.

But this vast fabric of German influence in Italy was swept away almost in a day by the new movement for the realization of Italy's national aspirations.

Italy and Balkans. How far Italy will go into the Balkan campaign will depend upon how far the leaders think it will contribute to their policy of Italy's national aspirations. They will not go into it as France has gone, to save Serbia. In fact, Italy's interests do not tend toward building up a strong Serbia, for Serbia, like Italy, has her aspirations for control of the eastern coast of the Adriatic.

Outstanding Figures of the present regime are Premier Salandra and Baron Scianino, minister of foreign affairs. They embody the spirit of Italy's policy of national aspirations, but are not of the radical nationalist party which believes in spreading these aspirations over all eastern Europe. They are of the cautious and moderate class. Salandra was a professor of law at the university, and he has the scholastic mind, which measures and balances everything, and is sure before he acts. Scianino, though voicing an aggressive new policy, is also regarded as a sure man, one of the old school marked for his extreme rigidity and correctness. He has been twice premier, was leader of the moderate party, so that it was much of the concession for him to take a place under Salandra, who had formerly been one of his lieutenants.

These two cool old heads are thus carrying out the new and aggressive policy of national aspirations. It makes a good combination—old heads for council and popular enthusiasm for momentum. And so this key-note "national aspirations" has become tremendously powerful and popular. It is one of those vague political phrases which for a long time have been the life of the party.

But this vast fabric of German influence in Italy was swept away almost in a day by the new movement for the realization of Italy's national aspirations. USING YOUR COUNTY AGENT

Farmer in Touch Gets Many Kinds of Service. Clemson College, Dec. 13.—Do you keep in touch with your county demonstration agent? If you are a farmer and do not, you are neglecting a big opportunity.

The co-operative extension work at Clemson college has an agent in every county in South Carolina except two and the vacancies in these two counties are only temporary. In each of three counties, there are two agents. Of these forty-five men, twenty-four are graduates in agriculture from Clemson college and some of the others are graduates of other agricultural colleges.

If you do not know who your agent is, find out at once and find out also where he has his headquarters and how he is to be reached. There are emergencies in which it is worth a great deal to know how to get in touch with the county agent. For example, cholera breaks out in a hog lot next to yours. You have a large number of good hogs. If you communicate with the agent, he will tell you how much serum to order from Clemson college or will order it for you, and will locate all the well hogs as soon as the serum arrives, saving a heavy loss.

The county agent is a very busy man. He has his lines of work mapped out and spends most of his time carrying out this program. But he is always ready to drop whatever he is doing and answer any farmer's emergency call. He knows what to do to check outbreaks of contagious stock diseases and to stop the spread of plant diseases and the ravages of insect pests; and whenever he finds a problem that he cannot solve, he knows where to get the solution in the shortest possible time.

Canary Breeding Stopped. Berlin, Dec. 13.—The business of the canary-breeders of the Harz mountains has been almost utterly destroyed by the war. Glad to say I am now feeling better than at any time for years and heartily recommend Fruittola and Traxo."

SKIMMILK AS POULTRY FEED. By-Product of Dairy is Excellent All-the-Year for Hens. Clemson College, Dec. 13.—Hens need some feed that is high in protein and they need this especially in winter. One of the best protein, or "meat," feeds that South Carolina farmers can use, says the poultry husbandman of Clemson College, is skimmilk or buttermilk. It is cheap, the hens like it, and gets results.
