(From page 9)

"We were working on the drop-back offense but we were losing games," said Dietzel. "It's not so much I like winning, but I despise losing."

"Dobby can do things with the men we have now, we're not going back to the offense we were attempting before, we're just not going to do it," said Dietzel. "Now we can run the ball and throw passes off the runs."

Unfortunately for Troup, Dietzel's reluctance to return to the drop-back offense would have to make his future shaky at best. A drop-back offense could conceivably win with Troup, as his passing talent would have its best opportunity then, but the 6-4 quarterback lacks the mobility of direct a rollout attack and so it would seem his potential would be cut back immensely.

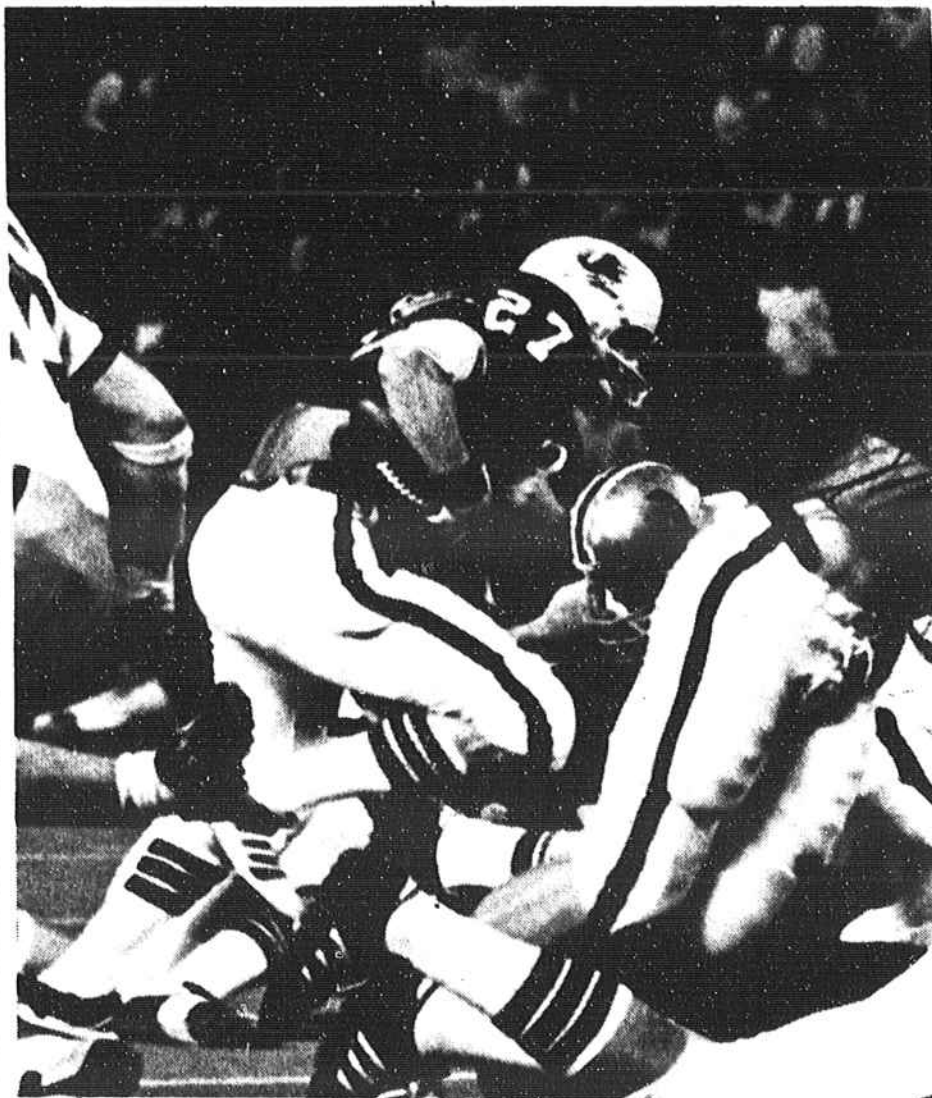

Although Troup appears to be the loser in the switching of offensive attacks, the team itself would seem to prosper greatly. Grossman's rollout theatrics have paced Carolina to successive victories over Memphis State and ASU.

Grossman scrambled for 36 yards in just seven carries, including some key first down jaunts, and passed for six completions in 11 attempts for 133 yards and two touchdowns against ASU. Grossman has now passed for five touchdowns in his two games.

"I can run," said Grossman, "If the opponents have the receivers covered or the line breaks down, I can scramble and we still have a chance to escape allright. I've got confidence in our team; we're playing better now."

Grossman continued, "A lot of success is because of a fine receiver named Mike Haggard. When I put the ball in the back's stomach and pull it back out and Mike's wide open it's an easy touchdown."

Grossman and Haggard combined for two touchdowns in the game, making their touchdown total five scores for two contests.
