foot trailer.

O'Donnell told The (Greenville) News in a deposition that it was policy to throw away foundation records every four years. The records dug up Saturday and Sunday were from the 1960s to 1984.

O'Donnell also said maintenance workers threw away the records during renovations.

John Matthews, a former USC crew supervisor, previously said the only papers that were thrown away during the renovations were scattered about the floor of the building and "looked like trash."

He said there were no boxes, as earlier described by foundation officials. Instead there were just a "bunch of loose papers."

The records have been the subject of a SLED investigation, requested by Provost Arthur Smith and Gov. Carroll Campbell this past month, since the foundation claimed the records were thrown away during the renovation project.

SLED investigators have also questioned Holderman about the disappearance of the records but refused to comment about the questioning. Holderman has not been available for comment for the past two weeks.

The records were ordered to be released this past month by the state Supreme Court after a 1987 lawsuit by The (Greenville) News and The Associated Press.

The foundation was only able to provide access to original records after 1985 and some information of the lost records stored on microfilm.

Since the disappearance became public, circuit Judge Carol Connor has ordered the foundation to prove why they should not be held in contempt of court for the destruction of the records, since the destruction took place after the lawsuit began.

Baus said he hired the McNair lawyers at the suggestion of a Dallas friend familiar with the McNair firm's Washington office. Baus declined to identify his Dallas friend.

Baus said the McNair firm billed him $150,000, which was negotiated down to $75,000. He said most of the bill was paid by his Texas friend.

ministrators, Palms decreed the current budgeting problems to be the university's biggest obstacle — a burden more directly levied on students than anyone else.

Palms said students would have a role in deciding about tuition and program cuts if the financial situation at the university did not improve.

He said he is scheduled to meet with the Legislature today but expressed that prudence was important to pave the way for relations between the Legislature and the university to be conducive for progress.

Palms said he has read about former President James Holderman's goals for USC to reach by the year 2001, the bicentennial of the university. He said he believes the goals are achievable.

"I think this is possible at the University of South Carolina because of the heritage, value system, and history, in this state. . . you have my promise that I will try to realize these goals," he said.
