the $20 price he had originally worked out.

Dubinsky said the main problem was an information gap. "I think there's a lot going on we don't know about," said Dubinsky. "I think this is a scam if this has happened more than once."

Dubinsky's fall class was reimbursed about $11 each. When Dubinsky found the same problems this spring he had his students send back the readers and has stopped using the packets all together.

Jeff Verver, a CAPCO representative, said the overcharging was "a clerical error that happened on our part" and is not a usual happening.

According to Verver, publishers have two ways of contracting copyright clearance. Some publishers, especially the larger companies, charge per set and will wait until the final number of students is available. Others, like the company involved in Dubinsky's instance, want the money up front and will decide the price based on the estimate.

Verver said students can find out the breakdown of the price of a course packet by calling the representative at the University Bookstore.

Jenny Roboni of Universal Copies said they work with the Copyright Clearance Center, a non-profit organization. The clearance center lists pre-approved copyrights, publishers, and rates. On average, one page cost between 3 cents and 5 cents.

Universal Copies rarely sells at the University Bookstore. They sell one course packet there, and Roboni said they work to reduce the price and keep the price down.

"Copyrights are done at no extra expense to the student," said Roboni.

David Berube, a theatre and speech professor, said he cancelled the use of a course packet after realizing that the cost was "outrageously expensive"—nearly $100.

Berube and Dubinsky both said they will discontinue the use of study packets.

According to Berube, the same materials that are often put in the course packets can be reserved at the library and students can copy these material themselves and avoid paying copyright charges.

Dubinsky, who plans on going back to textbooks, said, "I can count on the price of a textbook."

Brewer referred to a letter written by Kent Sidel in which station problems were discussed including, Brewer said, "organizational issues, people drinking in the station, people smoking in the station, people not being open to the general students."

Stephanie Smith, a freshman, said she tried to become a member of the station at the beginning of last semester. Smith said at last semester's student organization fair she signed up for WUSC but was never contacted. Smith said she found out about a meeting she attended from a friend.

"I went to the meeting, and I sat in," Smith said. "They were really childish the whole time. At the meeting they seemed really friend-oriented. They just didn't really associate with anyone else the whole time."

Another former DJ said, "It just seemed like they made the rules to suit themselves. It would change from week to week. At first I really liked doing it and I thought about going into it after school and that being my career but now I don't."

The committee was concerned about how the authority to fire the members of the executive board was given to Brewer and Carroll.

Brewer said he interpreted the Board of Student Publications and Communications decision at their meeting Jan. 15 as giving Carroll and the Department of Student Life the authority to "run the station and that includes all operations."

When questioned specifically about the dismissal of officers from WUSC, Brewer said, "I would think that the only way you can dismiss officers of a student organization is through their own constitution. The authority related to the station is the authority that was within the realm of the Board of Publications which they in turn delegated that to the Department of Student Life, Student Media."

Brewer said the station is "different" from other student organizations because it is a federally licensed radio station.

When the committee asked Brewer who's decision was it to dismiss the executive board, Brewer said, "That was a (Student Life) staff recommendation and I approved it."

The committee will continue to interview Carroll Wednesday.
