

Judicial Board seeks to uphold Carolinian Creed

ANGIE CAMPBELL Staff Writer

The Campus Judicial Board provides a peer review committee for non-academic disciplinary cases at USC. Members act as judges for such cases as assault, theft, and breaking and entering, said Nicole Moen, chief justice and English senior.

The board also has an educational role, which it practices mainly through Creed week, she said.

"People have noticed the creed is never mentioned in class," she said. "You never hear anything about academic integrity or those issues. We try to increase visibility of the creed and to get more people talking about it and, hopefully, enacting it in their lives."

The Carolinian Creed was adopted in 1990 and was written by a committee of faculty, staff and students because of the growing amount of crime at USC and other campuses across the country.

"I guess our theory is that you wouldn't need a judicial board if people lived by the creed, so, basically, we're trying to exterminate ourselves," she said.

The board also does University 101 ethics presentations and is designing a poster series on academic integrity, she said.

Currently there are 25 student members on the board, with each case presided over by a faculty chairman, a staff member and 5 to 7 board members, Moen said.

Student members must apply and interview in the spring and are officially appointed by the university president for a one-year term. Members are expected to undergo a training program, be in good academic and disciplinary standing, and follow the Carolinian Creed.
