kind of paint that is designed to reflect light. Franklin also met with the Director of Parking and the Director of Safety, to discuss safety in the garages. Franklin said he received assurance that patrolling of the garages has increased. Dining is always an issue in the elections, and Franklin was pulling for fewer dining restrictions on USC students.

After the election, he formed a dining committee, and met with the Director of Dining Services. The project to lower dining restrictions is an ongoing one, and currently the Vice-President is helping to coordinate a study to show what effects that lowered dining restrictions would have on the cost of meals. Grade forgiveness is a program that most other colleges offer, but USC does not. Immediately after the Homecoming festivities, a grade forgiveness campaign is set to kick off. There are plans for a petition drive and a phone call campaign. Franklin said a solid plan exists, that will get grade forgiveness implemented. "Students at USC are more likely to enroll in the more difficult classes if they feel they can have academic forgiveness" for a failing grade," Franklin said. The final plank of Franklin's platforms was to hold a race relations forum and this platform is due to be implemented in November. Many different activities are planned, including a student committee on race relations and a fund-raiser to help burned churches in the southern states to rebuild.

said. But, Briggs adds, there's much more to his job than tenure and he has goals planned for all the various aspects of his job. "My main goal is to try to keep the programs going that Don [Greiner] has set in place — Preston Residential College and the First Year Reading experience," Briggs said. "I'm really concerned with maintaining our contacts with [local] high schools." Briggs said USC invites several Advanced Placement students to visit university classes during the year. USC also works in conjunction with teachers in hopes of linking the University and local schools together, to provide students with a solid view of higher learning and to recruit students. With a such a set agenda, it's not hard to see that Briggs will be having a busy semester. Briggs said he sees the search for a new provost lasting throughout the school year, which curtails his classroom time. Yet, he's still able to teach a class on Horace, the Latin poet. Additionally, Briggs is getting ready to publish two books. He admits there may not be enough time in the future to write anymore books or teach anymore classes, but it's ok. At the moment he considers his new job pretty engrossing. "As a professor, you pretty much can only control your own bailiwick — your own program, maybe you have some say in your department," Briggs said. "But, up here, you really have the overview of the University." "You realize you have all kinds of opportunities to try to maintain a level at which the University conducts itself," Briggs said. Briggs came to USC in 1978. He earned a bachelor's degree in English and classics from Washington and Lee University and a master's and Ph.D in classics from the University of North Carolina.
