positive behavior programming and increasing academic achievement, they can improve the quality of life for their students," Yell said.

The college receives support from the state Department of Education's office of Exceptional Children.

"They have been very supportive of our efforts to train teachers in this area because it is a critical need in South Carolina. There is a shortage of teachers to work with youngsters with emotional disabilities in our state," Yell said.

This grant is a Personal Preparation Grant from the U.S. Department of Education. Colleges all over the U.S. apply for these competitive grants, and usually only about 10 percent of colleges actually receive the funding.

Yell said this funding will have several benefits.

"It'll help our state by producing more teachers in this area in which we see such shortages. It'll help, of course, the pre-service teachers get a state-of-the-art program in working with youngsters with disabilities" and will help by bringing tuition money into the College of Education, Yell said.
