GERMANS' DESIRE FOR FRENCH PORTS

Great Battle Being fought by Germans for Possession of French Seacoast

INVASION OF ENGLAND FEARED

It is Believed Hitler Expects Early Advance to English Channel

The past week of the European war has brought clearer evidence of a desire on the part of the Germans to secure control of England's major port cities, according to British sources. The German advance in France has been widening along the northern coast, and it is now believed that an attempt will be made to take possession of the French ports.

With the control of the entire west coast of France, the Germans will have complete control of the English Channel, which will allow them to bring their warships to the east coast of Britain from where they are based. This will give the Germans a clear advantage in any future naval engagements, and will allow them to project their power right up to the very heart of England.

There is a belief in the circle of German leaders that the capture of the French ports will mean that the war is over. This is generally believed that Germany can then turn its attention to the Pacific, where it is believed that the Allies will eventually fall.

However, the British are convinced that this is not the case. They believe that the war is far from over, and that the Germans will continue to push their advance until they have secured their goals.

British sources have reported that the German advance in France has been widening along the northern coast, and that an attempt will be made to take possession of the French ports. The Germans are believed to be preparing to secure control of the Channel ports, and that they will then move on to the east coast of Britain.

The British intelligence community is currently working to gather further information on the German advance in France, and to develop plans to counter any further moves by the Germans.

British and French forces are currently stationed along the French coast, and are prepared to defend against any German attempts to take possession of the Channel ports.

The British government is also working to gather intelligence on the German war effort, and to develop plans to counter any further moves by the Germans.

The British are convinced that the war is far from over, and that the Germans will continue to push their advance until they have secured their goals.

They are currently working to gather further information on the German advance in France, and to develop plans to counter any further moves by the Germans.