M. Briand this evening made the announcement to the newspapers that the council of ambassadors would meet in Paris and that it would take up the question of German reparations as an outcome of the present conversation between Mr. Lloyd George and himself. M. Briand added that real progress had been made in the conversations. Several points had been smoothed out with complete cordiality and "he was very much satisfied," he said.

M. Briand declined to be drawn into a discussion of the subject of secondary naval vessels, dismissing such inquiries by saying that the question still was under discussion, and added, "this is not the Washington conference."

The French premier previously had discussed the question of reparations with the Belgian ambassador, who visited him to press the claims of the Belgians, and was given assurance that nothing would be decided without the representatives of Belgium being *consulted. In this connection M. Briand again reminded the newspaper men that nothing could be definitely settled by the present conversations, which being purely between the British and French premiers, could in no wise be binding upon the other parties concerned in the question, namely, Belgium and Italy.
