Miscellaneous.

THE ELDEST DAUGHTER.

The eldest daughter occupies an important station in the family. She stands next to her mother. She is, in one sense, her right hand. If properly trained, she will be the support of her mother, in sustaining her authority in the family; she will be at hand to render assistance when needed; and she will take the place of her mother in her absence. But, above all if the mother should be removed by death, she will occupy her place in the education of younger children. All these things should be taken into consideration by the parents, in the training of the eldest daughter. A mother has much more time to devote to her first child than she can have to any other; and more to the first daughter than to the younger ones. If she succeed in training her aright, she will find herself greatly relieved in the management and education of all the rest. Children are imitative beings; and they will acquire habits from their mother, much more readily than by the teaching of parents; this renders it the more important that the first child should be well established in good principles and correct habits; and especially in the case of a daughter, so far as respects her influence upon the younger children, because she will be for a longer time the companion and assistant of her mother, and have a much greater share in the direction of family arrangements. She will also be the companion of the younger children, when the mother's eye cannot be upon them; and if properly trained, she will at such times, be the representative of the mother's authority.

But, if parents fail in the training of the first child—especially if it be a daughter, she will probably fall with all the rest. If she grow up ill-bred, with bad habits, and without fixed principles of action, her example and influence will counteract the efforts of the parents, if they attempt to retrieve their error in the better training of the younger ones. But that the subject may be seen in all its bearings, we will consider some particulars, to which the attention of parents ought to be directed, in the education of their first child; but more especially their eldest daughter.

1. They should secure prompt obedience.

There is no point in the moral training of children, so important as this, because nothing else exerts so great an influence over the whole system of a child. Obedience is this is a failure in every thing. Obedience is the net of submitting to the authority of
