AGRICULTURAL. From the Farmer's Register. MARL OF SOUTH-CAROLINA. WASHINGTON CITY, Jan. 24th, 1838.

There is a region commencing about forty miles below Columbia, and running parallel to the coast, in which is embedded much of a material which I have always believed to be marl.

[We have had not more leisure than would suffice for a very slight and incomplete chemical examination of the earth sent in the letter above; but that examination was enough to prove that it was a very rich marl.

It is a matter of additional gratification to us, personally, that our inquiries and suggestions on this subject have not been without effect, in inducing our correspondent to direct his mind to this subject.

TENDENCY OF SOILS TO DETE-RIORATE.

The natural, the inevitable tendency of all cultivation of the soil, is deterioration. The richest and most fertile, containing but a certain proportion fit for the purposes of vegetation; and every particle taken from the soil, sensibly lessens this quantity.

It is in the old world that this process of deterioration may be the most clearly traced. To renovate, seems to have formed no part of the ancient profession of agriculture.

stantly submitted to the plough, or at least as often as the soil promised to repay the expense of cultivation. This system has been abandoned; and a more enlightened system of agriculture has prevailed; and the products in consequence have been more than doubled.

Potatoes with Potatoes.—There is a great profit in feeding geese, turkeys & fowls of every sort, with potatoes & meal mixed; they will fatten in nearly half the time that they will on any kind of corn, or even meal by itself.
