The telegraphic news despatched on the arrival of the steamer America at Halifax, announced, in addition to a rise in flour and cotton, the important fact that Count Nicholas Whiskeywitch, the rich Russian nobleman, was among the passengers, and soon to rejoice Boston by his presence. Everybody talked of Count Whiskeywitch, and everybody asked everybody else what Count Whiskeywitch would think of America, and what Count Whi keywitch would probably tell the Czar when he went back to St. Petersbirg, and whether Count Whiskeywitch would probably write a book about us? etc., etc. The name of Count Whiskeywitch was heard on change, in the bar rooms, and in the boudours. Everybody was on the qui vive to see Count Whiskeywitch.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Semiramis Fleet gave a party to the upper ten. All sorts of distinguished people growded her saloons-Judg. es, literati, officers of the army and navy, hairy artists and heiressess, belles and blue stockings.

About twelve o'clock there was a great bustle and commotion in the drawing room. A little bandy-legged, fairy-faced man dressed in a blue frock braided and frogged with a star on his breast, and scarlet pantaloons seamed with gold lace, made his appearance, and ran up to the hostess, with an eager juvenill air.

Nobody knew him, but the words Count Whiskeywitch burst from the lins of all. He chattered something in an unknown tongue, and Mrs. Fleet replied in French, but the illustrions foreigner only shrugged his B'ionlder. A professor of all the modern languages from Cambridge was summoned to interpret-but the Count turned his back on him--of course the professor's Russian INGS, and Narrow Thread EDGINGS; was who ly unintelligible to a native! The illustrious for igner looked all round him, in vain endeavor to discover the friend who had brought him there!

The lacies crowded around him, and vied with each other in showing him attentions. But the Count bounded away from them and leaping up in the air, knocked a couple of drops from the chandelier with his walking stick. The ladies were ready to die of delight at witnessing the playful exhibition on the part of the foreign nobleman. Mrs. Semiramis Fleet contrasted his happy freedom of manner with the puritanic stiffness of the Boston beaux. Mr. D'Orsay Raymond almost died with envy at beholding the graceful ease of the

And how differently he danced from all the rest. Fools! to think that in three quarter's tuition they could learn that Redowan! The fair Fanny retired to the conservatory, for she was breathless and fatigued by the violent exercises to which her partner had subjected her. The Count daried in after her. The anxious mother was about to follow her footsteps.

"Stay!" said the hostess, laying her fan upon her friend's arm, "do not intrude upon the privacy of a Russian nobleman; who knows how you may jeopardize the pros-pects of Fanny! Ah! I wish I had a daughter to marry!

The lovely Fanny plucked an orange and raised it to her lips. The Count snatched it away and proceeded to eat it. Fanny blushed up to the temples--it was probably the Russian method of declaring love. She plucked another orange-the Count snatched it away and devoured it as before. So she kept feeding bin with oranges, and be kept devouring sweetness at her hands and love from her eyes. They were mutually fascinated. At last, when she had no more oranges to give him, he seized her hand and bit it. She was pained but delighted. There was no mistaking this declaration, and away she ran to ask her mamma's consent.

She whispered that Count Whiskeywitch had proposed in so audible a tone, that the whole ball room heard and were ready to die of envy. At this crisis a grash was heard in the conservatory. All rushed to the glass door. " My dear!" cried the hostess to her husband, "do look here. See how wildly the Count is amusing himself? He has pulled up all my japonicas by the roots and now he's flinging the pots through the glass roof." " Confound the fellow; he's drunk!" cried Mr. Fleet, a vulgar, matter-of-fact fellow, quite unworthy of his brilliant partner. "O, for shame!" cried the ladies. "It's his way." "I'll show him the way!" cried the exasperated Fleet. "Just look at him now! he's climbing up the trellices and pul.i g down my Muscats!" "Where is he?" cried a hoarse voice, as a vulgar red-faced man, a stranger to all present, pushed through the crowd. "Count Wniskeywitch, sir?" cried the

with fear, and looked up with imploring eyes, as if soliciting forgiveness.

Miss Fanny Brainless fainted,—her mamma became hysterical. Mr. Augustus Dawdle assured his friend that he knew it was a sell" from the first.

Count Whiskeywitch, the real Countneard the story, and left Boston in a huff. while the lovely Fanny consoled herself for er disappointment by marrying a young dicinity student who had long been enamored of her charms.

-The animal who had caused this flutter among the upper ten now resides in a glass ease in Kimball's Museum.
