The Commuter and His Untold Story About Hogs

THE commuter from Maplewood rushed into his Wall street office in New York ten minutes late, as usual. "Boys," he burst out, "the funniest thing happened!" "Say, has this got anything to do with the baby?" asked the chief clerk. "No, it hasn't," snapped the commuter. "As I was saying"— "Anything about the incubator?" asked the stenographer. "No!" bawled the Jerseyman, who was getting mad. "As I was saying"— "Leave out your new garden," said the bookkeeper. The commuter glared and went on. "I was about to tell"— "Say, has your kid got a new toot?" smiled the office boy. Then the poor man exploded. "I won't tell it at all," he yelled. "I was going to tell a story about new hogs, but I am afraid that you will take it as personal."—New York Globe.

He Couldn't Get Out of It. "Quite a lavish display of wedding presents, isn't it?" "Yes, I don't know that I ever saw so many beautiful ones before." "Idiotic, though. What do the people who give them care for the bride and groom? Everybody who brought a present merely did so for the purpose of showing off. If the cards of the people who gave these things were not attached to them I'll bet you nobody would have brought anything more lavish than a fifty cent spoon. They don't get me to make a fool of myself in that way. Why should these young simpletons who are getting married be stocked up with enough stuff to start a jewelry store? Did you give 'em anything?" "Yes, I gave them that $500 check over there. You see, I am the girl's father and couldn't very well get out of it."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Crucial Test. "Yes, the prisoner was a woman of extraordinary nerve. They tried in every known way to make her nervous." "That so?" "Yes. They shot off a gun unexpectedly, yelled 'Fire!' and told her a distant powder blast was an earthquake. Still she was unmoved. Then they liberated a mouse." "I'll wager a bank roll against a stogie that the mouse made her nervous." "Not at all. She only stepped on it and laughed." "Great Jupiter! Such a woman as that wouldn't lose her nerve if the earth exploded." "Oh, yes. One of the detectives stepped up and whispered in her ear that her hair had been mussed up for two hours, and then she collapsed.—Chicago News.

Fall Stop. Lady Helper—Come, Johnny, I'm sure you can manage one more piece of cake. Johnny (in a hoarse whisper)—No, thank, mum. Ah can still eat, but Ah can't swallow.—Punch.

An Inapt Comparison. "He looks like a Greek god," said the girl who raves. "I shouldn't say that," replied Miss Cayenne. "Most of the Greek gods I have seen in art galleries had vacant stares and pieces clipped off their ears or noses."—Washington Star.

Bertha's Idea. Belle—Bertha is getting to be quite famous. Blanche—Oh, well! Bertha's idea of fame is to ride around in a hansom and have people say "That's her!"—American Spectator.

His Peculiar System. "Yes, I'm going to eat all I can this year." "Why so?" "Because I'm afraid that everything eatable will be higher next year."—Baltimore Sun.

Four Ages of the Kiss. Though some perhaps may reckon less, Some calculate it more, This much is safely specified— The kiss has ages four.

On some defenseless baby's cheek The first kiss leaves its print, While doctors disapproving stand And microbes darkly hint.

The second kiss is quite the best Since Eden's bubble burst, For then the maiden asks the youth, "Am I the very first?"

Then comes the kiss the husband gives Upon his wife's fair brow, Whereat she sagely speculates, "What is he up to now?"

Last comes the kiss promiscuous, When past the years have whirled; On some fine woman is bestowed The smack heard round the world. —Melanburgh Wilson in New York Press.
