Wonderful Escape of Workman

Arthur Turner, a white workman on the new steel bridge being built over the Congaree river between this city and Cayce by the Southern railway, fell 62 feet yesterday from the bridge into the water and escaped without injuries.

Turner is one of the gang of steel workers and was at his work on top of the great structure that is to span the river and take the place of the present iron bridge. He stepped back suddenly while moving to get a piece of material and losing his footing fell the entire distance from the frame work into the river beneath. Fortunately there were no rocks in the water at the place where he fell and no water work with which he could come in contact with in his descent. He struck on his face in the deep water and after he came back to the surface swam to the shore and walked to his boarding house.

Fearing that the man was injured internally, his friends called a physician, but except for an inflamed face from the impact on the fall into the water, there was nothing the matter with him.—The State 6.
