

that the devil of fanaticism is to be fought only with fire. [Applause.] It was a "smashing blow," and the Thugs reeled under it. Mr. Vallandigham thanked the President, also, for his conversation with Governor Cox, who, along with John Sherman, seemed to want to perform the part of "Spaulding's glue" between Johnson and his enemies. As a whole, it was but a repetition of his message and speech. Mr. V. especially thanked him for his signal and manly rebuke to those bitter and narrow-minded bigots who object that "certain men," whom they have abused, slandered and injured, and therefore hate, are applicants for Johnson, firing cannon and lighting out flags. These objectors are a class of men who would not even let them get a chance, enter the gates of Paradise, if those "certain men" were there before them. Very well, again. If they do not like the goodly fellowship of "peace men," the Lord have mercy on them, for it is written "of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." [Laughter and cheers.] The President had said in that conversation that he had no cause for sorrow over the fact; and that the loyal men everywhere ought to rejoice that he had hit upon a kind of pacification acceptable North and South, even to rebels and disloyal men; and that the more he got of that support, if it were sincere, the better he would like it. Well done and well said, Andrew Johnson. And but a day or two ago, in reply to the Baltimore delegation, he had said that some men were saying of him that he had abandoned the party that elected him, "Tyrtized" his Administration, and joined the copperheads; but that he cared nothing for that. It is a pity, Mr. V. said, that some, hereabouts, who profess to be with the President, are not as independent. But they will come to that by and by. Evidently the President meant to recognize as his friends the men, everywhere, who were for his policy of immediate union and pacification, no matter whether, in the past, they had been Abolitionists, copperheads or "rebels," and he would be totally unfit to repel the war now waged against him, if he were to set on any other policy.

But it had been said in certain newspapers of easy or rather uncertain virtue, which are for the President three days, then for Congress three days, and next for three days part for and part against both, that Johnson will soon do or say something which will cause Democrats to regret ever having applauded him for anything. Now, Mr. V., for himself, would say that the President could not say or do anything so bad that he (Mr. V.) would take back what he had said or done over the veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, or the general doctrines of the veto message. They, at least, would stand. He well knew, indeed, that desperate efforts had been made to prevent a rupture between the hostile factions of the Republican party, and that even now politicians and office-holders were cherishing the deluding hope that the breach could yet be healed. But circumstances were more powerful than men. The differences were radical and irreconcilable. They grew out of utterly different notions of politics and government, and totally different purposes as to policy. There is, indeed, said Mr. V. one basis of adjustment. If the Republican leaders and party will consent to abandon all their plans of consolidation and centralization, and of reducing the South to the condition of Hungary, Poland, Ireland, and in good faith unite with the President and the Democratic party in the immediate restoration of the Southern States to the Union with all their rights, and the final pacification of the whole country, there will be no "split in the party," for we shall have but one party then; and then I will know that the inter-preters of prophecy are right, and that the millennium is surely to dawn in 1866; Dr. Cummins's re-entrance to the contrary notwithstanding. [Laughter.]

But I do not believe that the President will yield or falter for a moment, and if he will only re-organize his Cabinet, as he undoubtedly will very soon, then I feel sure of it. I have a reasonable faith in Andrew Johnson, and had from the first day that he became President, believing that he would, in the end, do and say precisely what he did and said the other day. So I declared on the 5th of May last; for I had known him for years. But I have a powerful faith in providence—in circumstances, if you choose to so call it; and I feel sure that he cannot but go on as he has begun. This has been my chief reliance from the first. No man is fit to be a statesman who does not reckon largely in his calculations as to the future upon the inexorable "logic of events."

Mr. V. then referred to the magnitude and hazard of the conflict in which the President was engaged. He was glad to observe that Andrew Johnson did not himself seem to underestimate it. Every Legislature of every Northern and Western State, Missouri included, was against him; so was almost every Governor—Ours oscillating in doubt—and so, certainly, a part of his Cabinet. So were probably two-thirds of the House, and almost two-thirds of the Senate. The great mass of the Republican leaders and press inclined the same way. The President had only the people to rely upon, and their true voice never could be heard only through public press and the Democratic and non-radical press. All must now speak out and at once. The struggle would be a fearful one. If ever there was a time when patriots everywhere should "support the Government," it was now. All men ought to be "loyal" in this crisis. In Republican phrase, "little while ago, the President was the Government," and entitled to support. In Democratic phrase, the thirty-five or thirty-six States made up the "Government," all of them, and as the Government, must be sustained. He believed the President was in earnest and was immovable, neither to be seduced nor to be terrified. In the end he would triumph. He had the whole South with him; the whole Democratic party, already nearly a majority in the North and West, and would have hundreds of thousands of the Republican masses; and all these together made up two-thirds of the people of the whole country. He declared ambition to be the restorer of the Union, was the highest, and might well satisfy the most aspiring; only let it be done in that mercy which is twice blessed; so that ours shall be the proud boast, emblazoned for ages to come upon the pages of our history, and belonging to us alone, of all nations, from the beginning of time, that we ended the most gigantic, most costly, most bloody, most devastating and destructive of civil wars, with liberty, re-union, peace and fraternal affection made secure, without the shedding, for political offences, of one drop of blood upon the scaffold. [Great applause.] If the President, who had himself suffered so much at the hands of those called "rebels," could now take them into fellowship upon the sole condition of future allegiance to the Constitution and obedience to the laws, surely it was but little that a like charity should be extended to them by those who, suffering nothing at home, during the last five years—many of them professing Christians, who themselves expected forgiveness, only through the abundant mercies of a God, than whom they imputedly aspired to be more omniscient, wiser and more just. [Cheers.]

One thing further, he would say. The example of the President in refusing the enormous patronage and really despotic power over the South, offered to him as a bribe, in the Freedmen's Bureau bill, was worthy of all praise. Under that bill and its kindred measures and policy, now before Congress, he might easily, through his black janitaries, have made himself—for a time at least—King, Monarch, Emperor of America. Few such examples of virtuous and patriotic self-denial had occurred in history. Caesar, in hypocrisy, thrice did put aside the proffered crown; yet at last usurped absolute power in Rome. Johnson, in sincerity and good faith, as I believe, rejects and spurns the gift held up before him, yet, in fact, intended only for his successor. Honor, therefore, when and to whom honor is due.

In conclusion, Mr. V. again expressed his regret that none, or scarce any, of those who voted for Andrew Johnson, and who professed still to be his friends, had come forward now in the beginning of his great struggle with fanaticism and permanent disunion, to sustain and hold up his hands in the only way practicable. Multitudes of them, honest men, not mere partisans, he did not doubt, would be brought along very soon by the force of circumstances. The choice could not be postponed. "Under which king, Bezonian; speak or die," would be the startling question now, and there could be no evasion. One thing all would soon learn; that the President depended on all who depended on him. None of that class, it was true, were here to-night to encourage, sustain and strengthen him. But he (Mr. V.) did not despair of them. In due season they would be along. Perhaps, in parting from long time friends and associations, it might at last have to be said of them: "Some natural tears they drop'd but wip'd them soon."

The struggle could not last long and the issue would not be doubtful, for, in Holy Writ, it was recorded, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib." [Laughter and applause.]

NEWSPAPERS.—Judge Longstreet, the late President of the South Carolina College, thus sets forth the value of a newspaper:

Small is the sum that is required to patronize the newspaper, and almost amply remunerated is the patron. I care not how humble and unpromising the gazette which he takes it is impossible to fill it fifty-two times a year, without putting into it something that is worth the subscription price. Every parent whose son is off from home, at school, should supply him with a paper. I still remember what difference there was between those of my schoolmates who had, and those who had not access to newspapers. Other things being equal, the first were decidedly superior to the last in debate and composition at least. The reason is plain, they have command of more facts! Youth will pursue a newspaper with delight, when they will read nothing else.

Women require more sleep than men, and farmers less than those engaged in any other occupation. Editors, reporters, printers and telegraph operators require no sleep at all. Lawyers can sleep as much as they choose, as they will thus keep out of mischief. Clergymen are allowed to sleep twenty-four hours, and to put their parishes to sleep once a week.

Clover is probably better than anything that can be put in an orchard, as it is known that the long roots carry manural substance to the under soil, and the stem shades the ground.

REMEDY FOR SMALL POX.—A gentleman of veracity, one who has had Small Pox in his family, and in his neighborhood, has placed in our possession for publication, the following recipe for the cure of the Small Pox, which he assures us has been successfully used in several cases that have come under his observation:

Take seven from the common elder root bark; and also a tea from the sassafras bark—let them cook and pour equal quantities into a jug, to a gallon of which, add from one quart to three pints good whiskey. Drink frequently, but not more than a small wine-glass full at one time.

Edgfield Advertiser.

Not so bad to take. Cant the whiskey be omitted, as we are afraid that the symptoms of Small Pox will be too prevalent.

An order was passed in the Texas Legislature making five years' residence in the State a necessary qualification for legislators. The Finance Committee reported a sweeping ordinance, declaring all debts contracted by the State in the late war null and void, and forbidding the Legislature to assume the payment thereof. Dr. Genner made a minority report favoring unlimited suffrage.

A whole village in Upper Hesse, Germany, is reported to have sold out, and will remove to Missouri in the spring.

The wheat crop of Virginia has been injured by the rigors of winter. An unusually large crop of tobacco it is believed will be made.

The President's veto of the Freedmen's Bill has arrested the contemplated emigration of a large number of Texans to foreign countries.
