From the Charleston Courier, July 28, 1869.

PORCHER'S Resources of the South.

—o—

The title of this well-known and valuable volume, is a comprehensive one, and fully conveys the idea of its contents. It develops, as it purports to do, the "resources of the Southern fields and forest; medical, commercial and agricultural;" and provides a complete "medical botany of the Southern States," far more comprehensive than any yet published—having, in fact, the advantage of using all previous publications—of which DR. PORCHER has made excellent use. It affords practical information of the most valuable kind, in respect to the "useful properties of the trees, plants and shrubs," abounding everywhere in the tropical vegetation of the South.

All the conditions of this promise of the title are fulfilled in the pages of this copious and most valuable volume; and, whether we consider the politician, the planter, the speculator, the housekeeper, or the simple citizen, this should be a household book with all. In brief, it takes rank with the absolutely necessary histories of the country; and where they exhibit little less than the strifes, the struggles, the wars, and the miserable politics of society, this volume throws us back upon God: shows us what have been the blessings and bounties we owe to His hands; shows us where to turn for resource at the hour of need; shows the statesman how best to calculate the probable products of the soil; the farmer how to avail himself of its natural productions; the domestic mediciner how to meet the emergencies of disease, from his native woods; and the domestic economist how to find, in probably the most miserable weed, an herb of grace as well as utility, giving relief to his pains, and savor to his soups.

Conveying almost every variety of instruction on all these vital subjets, this volume of DR. PORCHER was admirably calcuated to meet the exigencies of the great civil war, forced upon the Confederate States at a moment when their materials in food, medicine, metals and machinery were almost wholly wanting; art and science, irrespective of simple agriculture, was deficient in training and experience, and when our people suffered from privations which rendered necessary the exercise of every agency to meet the exigences of daily life.

The preparation of such a work as the present, happily occurred to the Surgeon-General of the Confederate States; and with a like felicity of judgment, he chose for its preparation the editor in whose able hands it achieved the most singular success, and became of general use throughout the war.

DR. PORCHER brought to his task all the essentials of study, science, thought and medical training so essential to the work. For 12 years, as physician and surgeon, he had dwelt in charge of the hospitals, enjoying daily opportunites for experimental investigations in Therapeutics and Practical Medicine. He had made the best use of these opportunities; of most incorrigible industry, his experiments were conducted through the nicest details, and subjected to all the most scientific tests. He was at once scientifically and practically naturalist; an explorer of woods and forests; an analist of shrubs, roots and herbs—gifted with a happy quickness in discriminating them, and an equally happy art in discovering their medicinal and other qualities.

Nor, in these studies in the open fields, did he limit himself to the teaching simply of material nature. He was well read in the best books of science, and tested their alleged truths by his own experience. The catalogue of scientific works which he has examined, constitutes, of itself a most capacious library. From the woods, fields and forests, the swamp and the rocks, from the writings of learned men, he turned again to contemporary authority, and sought from the individual citizen the forester, the farmer and planter, and old housekeepers, all that they could tell of their own discoveries in the domestic province. There were, and still are a thousand simple secrets of old people, of the red men and of the negro, which yield remedies against hunger and disease of which science as yet knows nothing.

With curious search and industry, DR. PORCHER sought out and followed all the clues, through whatever medium, which might conduct him to the new truth; and the result is, this most copious and comprehensive dictionary of Southern resource: whether for peace or war, for health or disease for toil to procure and art to manipulate, and reduce to human use.

Whether, as regards staple or farm culture, the proper modes for raising cotton, rice, sugar, indigo corn and the cereals, or the humbler ambition of the fruit, vegetable and garden grower, in all of these our author has been almost equally solicitious to procure the completest information and give the wisest counsel. No interest is overlooked, hardly a single object of use, however unknown or however much despised, and the volume rises into the rank of a history, as essential to that of the South in general, as any that teaches the progress of society and its experiences through the two hundred years of its past existence. The book may and should be kept alongside the State's history of its civil and military affairs; of its growth and development in human respects and character. It provides a fitting auxiliary and companion volume to every such history in each of the Southern States.

The style of the author is clear and unaffected, neat and sufficiciently compact. He seldom falls below his subject, and exhibits no vain ambition to rise above it. In his preface, he narrates the manner of his progress, without assumtion as without disguise. The alphabetical index to the COMMON names of plants will gratefully meet the needs of the simply practical, while the index of the botanical names of genera and species, will satisfy the scientific student, to whom the common names may be unfamiliar. These indexes are valuable additions to the work, necessary, in fact, in a volume so crowded with its thousand topics not one of which is without its interest and value to the people of the South. It should be in the library of every Southern household and deserves to be well thumbed.

The volume, beautifully printed on fine paper, with a clear new style is from the press of Messrs. Walker, Evans and Cogswell, who have acquitted themselves of their share of the work with the most commendable skill, neatness and good taste. It is a large octavo, neatly bound, and contains more than seven hundred pages of letter press. Such a publication is highly honorable to our local literature, especially when we consider under what circumstances it was originally prepared, under what discouraging aspects of society, it has been republished in such handsome costume.

From Charleston Daily News, July 28th.

OUR FIELDS AND FORESTS.

We are glad that Dr. Porcher has met sufficient encouragement to warrant him in issuing a second edition of his very valuable work. The book was written and published during the late war, by direction of the Surgeon-General; and what with a small edition originally printed, and the general destruction by the war of every species of book, the work had already become rare, and much sought after. We are pleased, therefore, now to see our old friends reappear, and dressed by those famed literary tailors, whose names appear at the foot of the title page, not in the dingy "Confederate Gray" of the first edition, but in splendid paper, typography and binding.

A book like this is a great desideratum here at this time. The war, from necessity, threw our people largely upon their own resources, and long forgotton "domestic remedies" were again brought from their obscure recesses. So with valuable dye stuffs, seeds, grains, and material for fine textile fabrics. Dr. Porcher in this book, points out and describes, both for the learned and unlearned reader, no less than five hundred substances, possessing every variety of useful quality, all to be found within the limits of the Southern States; and for all of which, be it remembered, there is a ready market. Here, then, are vast undeveloped resources, and likely to remain undeveloped, at least in a great measure, for the want of intelligent guidance. Not long since the writer endeavored to procure a book that should contain directions for the unlearned, how to gather and prepare such of these indigenious roots, herbs, leaves, barks, seeds, &c., as are sought for in the markets of the world; but after considerable inquiry he found that there is no book extant that gives such information. Dr. Porcher's book contains this information, with minute directions where to find, and when to gather the articles described. We can confidently say that it is the very best treatise on this subject to be had in the United States.

Some of our readers in the interior may be surprised to learn that herbs, weeds, and other such "trash," that they have seen "run to seed" all their lives, should have a remarkable value. Such, however, is the case.

From XIX Century, July, 1869.

Treating specially of our medicinal plants, and of the best substitutes for foreign articles of vegetable origin; instructing the common mind how to select, collate and utilize substances of great value; suggesting to the professions and trades, and to capitalists, ideas calculated to open new fields of profitable research and experiment—this work of Dr. Porcher is pre-eminently the most important contribution to science and art, to the home and fireside, that has yet been made by any writer in the South * * * The work deserves careful study. The merchant, factor, planter, farmer, physician and surgeon, mechanic—the representative of every sphere of activity, will find in it much that will gratify and reward.

Notices of first edition. Opinion of Mr. Ravenel, as expressed in a letter to the author.

On the whole, I have been surprised at its general accuracy and freedom from typographical errors, knowing as I do from experience, how difficult it is for the printers to be correct in scientific terms. The connection between practical medicine and Botany opens a vast, very vast, and almost unexplored field, and your book lays the foundation for its study and application.—It will take its place at a standard work on that subject, and in course of time will need corrections, additions and amendments.

Official communication from Surgeon-General S. P. Moore, C. S. A.,—To the author upon the completion of the task assigned him.

The comprehensive information displayed in the preparation of this work has been fully appreciated by the public, and very flattering notices of its issue have been given by the press to which it has been freely distributed, with the request that as many as possible of the more valuable extracts be republished.

Permit me to say that your labors have met with the approval of this office which takes pleasure, whilst expressing its appreciation of the manner in which you have accomplished the task undertaken by you; at the same time to compliment you on the ability with which you have enlightened the profession and society upon matters, a full knowledge of which is so important. The work has been distributed widely among the MEDICAL OFFICERS.

From Southern Illustrated News, Richmond, Va.

We incline to the opinion, that a more useful work has never been issued from the American press. * * *

Most particularly do we commend this work to the notice and acceptance of families and house wives, who would not suppose from the title that it contained anything that would be specially suited to their tastes and wants. They will discover that no book of receipts ever published is more compact of serviceable hints and suggestions. Indeed in this point alone, it is worth all the "Enquire Withins" and "Things Worth Knowing" that were got up with such profusion for sale in the Southern States It would be difficult to tell what may not be found within its lids.

From H. W. Ravenel (one of the most distinguished authorities on questions of Natural Science at the South.

The title indicates the scope of its object. It is to bring to notice the resources of our fields and forests, for medical, economical and agricultural purposes.

Dr. Porcher's previous researches and studies had well qualified him for such labors. His publications on our indigenous materia medica had familiarized him with his subject, and enabled him to use to advantage a vast amount of material which he had thus collected. An extensive practice in the city of Charleston and the occupation of the Chair of Materia Medica in one of the Preparatory Schools, gave him ample opportunities of knowing and testing the various resources of the profession, both mineral and vegetable, whilst his fondness for the natural sciences, combined with some familiarity with botany, enabled him to apply his knowledge to the best advantage.

Soon after the fall of Norfolk, where he occupied the place of Hospital Surgeon, he was relieved from duty in the field, and under direction of the Surgeon-General, had this duty assigned him. A better selection could not have been made.

From London Index, (Eng.)

Notice of first Editor.

The Charleston Courier has an article on "our Botanical Resources," in which it notices a book entitled "Resources of the Southern Fields and Forests, etc., etc., by Francis Peyre Porcher, Surgeon. Prepared and published by order of the Surgeon-General, Richmond, Va.

Dr. F. P. Porcher gives an account of 400 substances possessing every variety of useful quality. The list includes textile fibres, grains, seeds, oils, gums, resins, dyes, starch, acids, liquors, materials for paper and cordage, medicines of all qualities, wood for all uses, &c. Truly the resources of such a country, in the hands of such a people, are wonderful, and its natural riches inexhaustible.

The McLendon Expansion Roll,

To be attached to old gins, the work of Mr. E. F. Parker, of Abbeville, supplies a want long felt. It is attached at the trifling expense of $10, and increases the speed of the gin from one fifth to one third, without increasing the draft. With this improvement, the gins will gin cleaner, and make better lint that without. It has been tested at Abbeville, and given satisfaction in every case. The public are notified not to trifle with this patent. Any intringement upon it will be handled according to law. Those wishing to know anything about the above patent, are referred to Mr. N. A. Hunter, agent for Newberry.
