One day a friend came into the store, flushed and jubilant. He had made fifteen thousand dollars at a single leap of the Grand Trunk stock; and he had done all upon the investment of five thousand dollars. A friendly broker had advised him that Grand Trunk was going to jump. The stock was then at twenty. He gave the broker five thousand dollars, and told him to go in. The broker took up one thousand shares, paying down five dollars per share, the rest to be paid within ten days. On the very next day the stock went up to thirty, then to thirtyfive, and at this figure the friend sold.

Charles thought how grand it would be if he could make fifteen thousand dollars as easily as that. But where should be get the capital to start with? He went out upon the street and talked with those who were posted. He talked with other cashiers who he found had tried their hand at the golden game. He heard that his old chum, Phil. Bret, had won a fortune, and he went to see him.

"How did you do it, Phil?" "I bought just in the nick of

"I borrowed it." "You borrowed ten thousand?" "Whew! You're simple, Charley. But you can keep a secret ?"

"Yes." "Then you can borrow as I did."
