A JAPANESE HOTEL.

In imagining a Japanese hotel good reader, please dismiss all irchitectural ideas derived from the Continental or the Fifth Avenue. Our hotels in Japan, outward, at east, are wooden structures, two stories high, often but one. Their roofs are usually thatched, through the city caravansaries are tiled .-

They are entirely open on the front ground floor, and about six feet from the sill or threshold rises a "Why," he replied. "because I platform about a foot and a half high, upon which the proprietor may be seen seated on his heels be hind a tiny railing ten inches high busy with his account books. If it is Winter he is engaged in the ab sorbing occupation of all Japanese tradesmen at that time of yearwarming his hands over a charcoal fire in a low brasier. The kitchen is usually just next to this front room, often separated from the street only by a latticed partition. In evolving a Japanese kitchen out of his or her imagination, the reader must cast away the arising conception of Bridget's realm .-Blissful, indeed, is the thought as we enter the Japanese hotel neither that the typical servant girl nor the American hotel clerk is to be found here. The landlord comes to meet us, and falling on his hands and knees, bows his head to the floor. One or two of the pret ty girls out of the bevy usually seen in Japanese hotels comes to assist us and take our traps. Welcomes, invitations, and plenty of fun greet us as we sit down to take off our shoes, as all good Japanese do, and as those filthy foreigners don't, who tramp on the clean mats with muddy boots. We stand up unshod, and are led by the laughing girls along the smooth corridors, across an arched bridge which spans an open space in which is a rookery.

garden, and pond stocked with goldfish, turtles, and marine plants. The room which our fair guides choose for us is in the rear end of scenery for which Kanozan is justly famous all over the empire. Nine ty-nine valleys are said to be visible from the mountain-top on which the hotel is situated, and we suspect that multiplication by ten would scarcely be an exageration. A world of blue water and pines, and the detailed loveliness of the rolling land, form a picture which [Lippincott's Magazine.
