ORCHARD AND NURSERY.

Trees planted this fall should have earth drawn up around them, making a mound 12 to 15 inches in height. It should be of solid, clean earth, free from all sods, weeds, etc., or else it will furnish a winter home for mice. The mound thus made serves a double purpose of a support to the young tree against the winds of winter, and prevents mice from gnawing the tree. Rabbits can do much harm to a young orchard. When the trees are few they can be protected by bands of cloth, or even tarred paper. These pests have a distaste for meat, and may be kept away from the trees by rubbing them with flesh or smearing the trunks with blood. Boys can catch many of them by trapping, and afford what is to many an acceptable variety for the table. If the weather remains mild, and the ground open, trees may be still planted. South of the 40th parall lel planting may be done during the greater part of the winter. Planting in the fall relieves the pressure of spring work. If the ground is frozen, rather than place the roots among frozen clods, it is better to heel-in the trees until spring. The labels upon the trees should be looked to. Never leave the labels on the trees that are placed there in the nursery. They are usually wired on tightly, and are only intended to identify the trees when received, and not for permanent use. Unless labels are and the first thing she said was well made and firmly fastened to the trees, they are soon lost. The old kind made of pine, and marked with a rather hard lead pencil upon a fresh coat of white lead paint is cheap and durable. Some prefer zine strips. For orchards it is best to have a chart, with each tree and its kind recorded, and not trust at all to labels. Cions may be cut as soon as the leaves fall, packed in sawdust or sand, and put in a cool cellar until needed for grafting. Care should be taken in selecting the cions, cutting them only from thrifty and heal trees. It is better to buy cions than to use any poor ones. Root grafting is done during the winter, and therefore the stocks should be in a convenient place. They are taken from the ground before it freezes, asserted, tied in bundles, and then placed in boxes with the roots covered with soil and put in a cellar. The seeds of trees for spring planting are best of the mice. The fences and gates
