

The pigmy brought to America by Rev. Samuel Phillips Verner and told about in The State some time ago, is causing endless trouble. Preachers have raved about it, students of natural history have studied it and the pigmy is picking up enough knowledge of civilization to acquire money to buy a wife when he goes back to the wilds of Africa. The little fellow's name is Ota Benga and he was found in 1904 on one of the southern tributaries of the Congo by Mr. Verner, the African explorer, who is connected with the American Museum of natural history, but his coming to New York was an accident. He was in the hands of the hostile cannibalistic tribe of the Baschilde. He was slated to be the chief viand at a feast. Mr. Verner rescued him by paying a price in calico and beads, and Ota Benga became a willing servant. He was the son of a chief of the pigmy tribe. He had been twice married, though only 23. His first wife was eaten up by cannibals. His second wife died from the sting of an African viper, a very beautiful snake, of which Ota exacted later a terrible vengeance by bringing him to the New York Zoological park to pass his days in captivity. It was the intention of Mr. Verner to return the pigmy to his own land, but he could not do it, and finally Ota wanted to come to America with him as his servant, the understanding being that he should return to Africa later with Mr. Verner and to his own country. He was turned over to the museum of natural history until Mr. Verner returns to Africa and that is where the trouble started.

HIS LOVE FOR MONEY.
One of the New York papers, in speaking of his love for money, already acquired, says:

"If a photographer wants him to pose he must first produce money. He will not show himself on special occasions unless he is given coin. Reporters have to shell out quarters every few minutes or he becomes absent. The general crowd in the park sees him, however, as he haunts the monkey-house. He is saving the money religiously to buy a wife when he gets back to Africa. There is no sign of native cruelty about him. He will probably treat the little black girl that he buys with consideration far above what she could expect from a lord and master who had not traveled as Ota has."

"When the sun came up yesterday morning Ota Benga was missed from his room in the Primate's house. He had gone out clothed in his uniform of army khaki, for a few hours in the jungle of woods back of the monkey house. There he has made African traps for squirrels of twigs and strings. He has hunted through every inch of the underbrush, crawling with his bow and arrow in his hands, through the forest like a wraith. He surprises the laborers along the Bronx river by suddenly rising up among the underbrush when they do not know that he is near.

"He follows the wild muskrats along the shore without alarming them and calls down the gray squirrel to his nest in the tree. His bow and arrow he made after entering the park and with it he did some wonderful feats yesterday, shooting twigs in two at great distances and knocking over targets that would frighten William Tell to look at."

"Delegations of negro ministers from the city have appeared at the park and remonstrated with the officials for keeping Ota Benga 'imprisoned' there. They say it is slavery. The answer is that Ota can go when he pleases. And Ota himself looks at the civilized colored brethren with horror and vows that he will not leave the park till Mr. Verner comes in a month or so to take him home to Africa."

Mr. Verner is expected to visit his parents in Columbia before going back to Africa and a statement from him will be of peculiar interest.—The State.
